INTRODUCTION

OF the periods of the world's history signalized by national aspiration and achievement, and at the same time fraught with a spiritual significance reflected in the mind of a master poet, the age of Aeschylus holds a foremost place together with the age of Shakespeare. Imagination bodied forth in poetry of the loftiest order found, alike in Hellas in the earlier part of the fifth century and in England under Elizabeth, its inspiration and ideal in the living present.

The life of the Greek dramatist fell upon times of external and internal unrest, times of vivid emotions, of joy and wonder and hope, when the Athenian as an individual first discovered himself, first surveyed the spectacle of life with intellectual interest and in self-reliance, and with high spirit and impassioned energy engaged in keen struggle for his personal and national existence in confident expectation of an adequate reward, and with an ever-present recognition of his obligations to the commonwealth. It was the age of expansion and aggrandizement, the age that witnessed events that proved the resolution and the valour of Athens when she cast aside her timidity under despotism. In the lifetime of the poet Athens expelled the tyrant of the house of Peisistratus, reformed the constitution under

INTRODUCTION

Cleisthenes so that it now enlisted the support of all her citizens, and established a polity ensuring to the State a free course to further self-development into a true democracy. In his lifetime too the city acquired a material strength entitling it to take a commanding part as an international power in the triumph of Greece over the despotic barbarism that for a generation had menaced it with annihilation of its political existence. In this triumph the countrymen of the poet had displayed heroic self-sacrifice and indomitable courage. And when the Persian peril had passed, and the possibility of the return of the arbitrary lawlessness of tyranny was for ever removed, the later life of the poet witnessed the rebuilding of Athens, whose temples and homes had been razed by the invader, and at its close the beginning of those strongly conflicting currents of the older and the newer political life as the democracy was shaping its victorious course under the captainship of Pericles. In his youth the Athens of Aeschylus was a petty cantonal State ruled by the uncontrolled will of a despot; at his death, her citizens were warring simultaneously in Asia, in Egypt, in Cyprus; her fleet commanded the Aegean, and she was moving steadily toward an empire won and maintained by sea-power.

Aeschylus is the only Athenian representative in literature of this age crowded with events of far-reaching importance both for the city-state, and for the larger world, an age represented in war and statesmanship by such giant figures as Miltiades, Themistocles, Aristides, and Cimon; in painting, sculpture, and the ceramic art by Polygnotus, Myron, and Brygus; each of whom had responded to the intense stimulus offered by his environment. Aeschylus was not merely a spectator, he was a participant in the impulses and mighty movements of the period, and helped to make his times in a far different way than his contemporaries Simonides and Bacchylides. Even as Homer mirrors the conflicts of an earlier age in an art characterized by exuberant fancy and spontaneous feeling, so Aeschylus mirrors the second great period of Greek thought as he presents the more reflective spirit of Attic national life as it was engendered by the war in defence of national independence.

INTRODUCTION

Liberty, won by revolution, had awakened the Athenian people to self-consciousness and stimulated it to inaugurate self-government under freedom safeguarded by law enacted by a sovereign people. Ideas of justice and the divine regulation of the world now acquired a significance hitherto unknown to a population largely agrarian. The barriers of that narrower, provincial world had now been swept away. Men, drawn together by external danger, experienced an impulse toward spiritual unity, heretofore unknown, and even an active sentiment of unanimity, which was soon however to be dissolved under the centrifugal influences of Greek political action. From the transformation in the external world of politics and society, the defeat of barbarian insolence, the momentary unification of the defenders of the freedom of Greece, Aeschylus may well have been led to his conception of the evolution of mankind, and of the gods themselves, proceeding from tyranny to liberty, from struggle to peace, from discord to harmony. To the confusions of anarchy and barbarism succeeds the equity that is the basis of law and order.

But this transformation of the older Athens was scarcely more rapid or more profound than that of the tragic art under the hand of its true founder. The art of literature, as that of architecture and sculpture, displayed at this period a rapidity of evolution unequalled in history.

Aeschylus exhibited his first play in 499, only thirty years after Peisistratus, who tempered tyranny with patronage of the arts, had established, as a public institution, the annual contest in tragedy at the festival of the City Dionysia. In this contest Thespis, reputed the first tragic poet, whose plays had heretofore been produced at village celebrations, won the prize. Aeschylus' first victory was gained in 484, four years before the battle of Salamis, and from that date till his death in 456 he was the master tragic poet of his time.

The art as he received it, we may conjecture in the absence of all remains, consisted almost exclusively of choral songs varied with interludes of narrative, together with some brief dialogue between the leader of the chorus and a character impersonated by a single actor, whose introduction was due to the genius of Thespis. Plot, in the later sense, genuine advance in the action, and character-drawing were absent. The art, as he left it, had well-nigh attained to its fullest capacity of original expression. From Homer and Hesiod and the Cyclic poets, from elegiac, iambic, and melic poetry, especially that of Stesichorus, from ancient books of sententious wisdom and the earlier and contemporary writers in prose who dealt with the traditionary myths, Aeschylus derived his mythology and the fabric of his fables, into which he breathed the breath of his own spirit and through which he found expression for his own thought on things human and divine. More by virtue of his imagination, his moral and religious feeling, and his brooding thought than by virtue of his reason and his intellect, he fashioned heroic personages into dramatic characters charged with will and passion, and whose motives, deliberately conceived, impelled the action forward; characters, even when individual, none the less contemporaneous with every age because typical of universal humanity. Greater, however, than the poet's power to stamp his single persons with individuality is his ability to sweep a wider horizon and to depict the characters of whole families and even of a whole people. His interest is less in the individual than in the family or national group in whose fortunes the individual is involved. The poetic gift native in him, an Athenian, his contact with life at a period of stimulating political and social convulsion, when man had attained to a sense of his spiritual no less than his political liberty, could find expression only in an art, which, though but just created, voiced as no other the instinct of his age and race. That art alone possessed the power to reflect the collective spirit of the intensified life of a free commonwealth that had no counterpart in the society depicted by the great epic poet, whose story of war and adventure still commanded the admiration of vast assemblies at the rival concourses of the rhapsodes. The myths, still darkly obscure from the twilight of their births, he refined in the light of the clarifying spirit of a faith based alike on reason and on piety.

INTRODUCTION

In the myths and legends of the race he discovered an ethical and religious content: he transformed them into problems of human destiny or of the divine righteousness: Prometheus suffers, Io suffers, before our eyes; and instantly we are made to confront the question whether the lord of Olympus is a just god. He naturalized himself in those high altitudes of thought and emotion whence he could survey the springs of good and evil, the mysterious agencies of the fate that makes man's character its instrument, the relation of punishment to sin, the meaning of suffering, the dealings of God with man, and the essential unity of the divine purpose. With these lofty themes he dealt primarily as an artist not as a preacher; and he discloses inconsistencies that forbid our ascribing to him any exclusive or deliberate philosophic or religious system of belief. Neither mystagogue nor philosopher moulded his spirit to mystery or dogma. Greater than his work was the man, greatest of his coevals, though the work is the distillation of a mind of spiritual grandeur, and burdened, in its ancient way, with the mystery of all the unintelligible world.

Philosophy in Aeschylus' day had ceased to be the province of the solitary searcher into the causes of things. Except when, as in the case of Pythagoras, religion was associated with physics, the Ionian thinkers included man in their speculations only in so far as he constituted a part of nature. Aeschylus found in man the centre of gravity of the world, in man, whose mind, experience, and action are implicated alike in his environment and in those far-off influences that descend to him from successive generations of his ancestors. He had some inkling of the complexity of the causes underlying human events. He could, in the Prometheus at least, find the central germ for tragic action in motive developed pre-eminently from within. He has not indeed harmonized the discordant elements of life, but the keystone of his fully developed art is his recognition of the causal connexion of character, deed, and catastrophe. If he has less variety than Euripides and even than Sophocles, he sees life more as a unity than they. He related the eternal verities of the ancient wisdom of the race, the maxims of conventional ethics, to the life of man as it acts and suffers; and at the same time he displayed the universality of their application in the personages of the heroic past. Step by step, and by repeated trials, availing himself of the more favourable conditions in the State after the conclusion of the Persian war, he mastered the technique of his art, whose more mechanical (but none the less spiritual) forms, music and the dance, he developed to the highest perfection they enjoyed in connexion with ancient dramatic art. He gave to tragedy its directing principle in substituting for the choral the more vivid dramatic element, which alone could bring into high relief the impulse and the judgment inspiring human action. He created, it seems, the larger unities of trilogy and tetralogy, which, when formed of plays interconnected by the myth, each a drama comprising a complete action, yet itself only a part of a greater whole, embody the loftiest conceptions of Greek dramatic genius. To Aeschylus belongs in fact the distinction of shaping a nascent art into the grand form : ἄπαν δ' εὐρόντος ἔργον. He abridged the effect of time in obliterating the work of his predecessors. His successors might work in the light of his achievements, their understanding and their imagination largely set in motion by his own. He owed the direction of his craftsmanship to none greater than himself. He was, in a word, the legislator of the tragedy of the world. He did not seek to make his art conform to the taste of the day but to ennoble that taste in the light of an ideal world. Scanning farther horizons he dedicated his work to Time, which his contemporary Pindar called the "lord of the immortals," and "the best protector of just men."

Aeschylus was born in 525-524 according to the tradition commonly accepted in antiquity, a tradition that may be approximately correct. His father was Euphorion, an Athenian of the deme Eleusis. Eleusis had originally been a petty State, the memory of whose independence had not been obliterated in the seventh century—if to this period may be referred the Homeric Hymn to Demeter, which records the reign there of a native king. The incorporation of the smaller into the larger community had been attended by religious sanctions dealing with the regulation of the Mysteries, to the initiation into which all men of Hellenic stock were bidden. At Eleusis there existed, until the fourth century at least, qualities of character and taste differentiating its population from that of the native Athenians. Euphorion was a member of the nobility and, as it seems, a man of affluence. By birth Aeschylus stood higher in the social scale than either Sophocles or Euripides. He recognizes the nobility of ancient lineage: "He that is nobly born holds in high esteem the throne of Honour," and he describes the possessor of ancient wealth as kind to his slaves. In his sympathy for common people he has more human tenderness than his aristocratic contemporary Pindar; an Athenian noble was built after a different pattern than a Boeotian or a Dorian aristocrat. Despite his social position Aeschylus himself acted in his plays. Nor need this move our surprise. In his time the rôle of the dramatic poet was imperatively associated with that of the actor as it was with skill in music and the orchestric art, a combination of functions that did not impair the ability of its possessor to serve the commonwealth both in the Assembly and in the field. Nor was the gain slight for the youthful drama if poet was likewise actor. The actor must translate into informing sound and sight the creation of his other self.

As an eupatrid¹ Aeschylus was a member of the ancient aristocracy, the creation of which legend referred to Theseus. The political privileges of those families, found in all the various gentes which were distinguished for wealth and power, had indeed been finally swept away by the reforms of Cleisthenes along with many of the old local rites in which they had borne a prominent part. Their social prestige, however, and their controlling influence in the formal conduct of religious offices in the State still existed for a century later. They had been connected with the introduction of the worship of Dionysus, and it is probable that recourse was had to them by men seeking purification from pollution because of blood-guiltiness.¹ At Eleusis the eupatrid family of the Eumolpidae regulated the observance of the ritual of the Mysteries, furnished the hierophant for the festival, constituted the college of interpreters of the sacred law, and in certain cases formed the court to pronounce judgment in trials for impiety. Another eupatrid clan, the Ceryces, provided the priests of less importance, and, together with the Eumolpidae, had charge of the rites of initiation. To which of the several eupatrid families of Eleusis the poet belonged, is unknown; but his birth under the shadow of the famous sanctuary of purer religious aspiration ensured to his youth a period in which the subtler influence of the holy Mysteries of the Mother and the Maid might germinate and prepare him for his mission, not as a mystagogue, but as the religious teacher of his people through the medium of dramatic art.

¹ The name is here applied as a general designation of the "nobility" and not as the name of a special family, the Eupatridae. This family (γένος), it may be remarked, was excluded from the cult of the Eumenides, the defenders of mother-right, apparently because of its connexion with Orestes, the champion of the father-right. It has been conjectured that Orestes was regarded as the ancestor of the γένος and the first "interpreter" concerning the purification of suppliants in cases of murder. See Töpffer, "Der eleusinische Priesteradel" in his Attische Genealogie.

INTRODUCTION

While the probability of this influence upon the growing poet may not be gainsaid, there nevertheless remains the problem whether or not he was actually an initiate, and, if such, so conversant with the ritual in its completeness that he might not be unfamiliar with features which it would be sacrilege to divulge. Was it that his independence of current ethics and his tendency to mythological heresies,

INTRODUCTION

of which the tragedies give ample evidence, was it that too close proximity to the shrine, caused him to feel no need of the Eleusinian consecration? Aristotle, however, reports, and his authority is seemingly confirmed by Clement of Alexandria, that the poet, when charged with impiety for divulging certain features of the Mysteries, sought to exculpate himself on the plea that his error was due to inadvertence, since he had not observed that the matters in question were comprised within the secrets of their rites. Heracleides Ponticus, a disciple of Aristotle, supplies the (probably unauthentic) details that Aeschylus had nearly been put to death in the theatre but escaped only by taking refuge at the altar of Dionysus; and that, when brought to trial before the Areopagus, he was absolved chiefly because of his heroism at Marathon. But neither Heracleides nor Aelian, who also knows the precise circumstances of the affair, knows enough to name the piece or the matter of Aeschylus' indiscretion. The specific matter of offence (as the title of the offending play or plays) was in fact unknown to the ancients; while their various conjectures and those of the moderns, especially the suggestion that the Eumenides furnished the occasion of the charge, lack plausibility. It is quite probable, in the absence of a sacerdotal caste, which safeguards but does not make theological belief, that the poet's alleged profanation was concerned, not with any secret doctrines of a creed (the Eleusinian Mysteries were essentially not dogmatic, and Aristophanes did not scruple to reproduce their formulas with only slight alteration), but with some purely formal aspect of the dramatic symbolism regarded as sacred in the rites. The crowd fastens rather on neglect of ritual than on theological heterodoxy. Aeschylus was indeed given to expressions of speculative theological opinion, but his orthodoxy, unlike that of Dante, seems not to have been involved. The fact of the accusation, however, remains though no poet of Greece was so profoundly permeated by a fervent religious spirit as was Aeschylus.¹ Whatever the original application of the verses put by Aristophanes into the mouth of Aeschylus at the outset of his encounter with Euripides (Frogs, 886-887) in the lower world, the first, at least, we know to have been composed by the older poet,

INTRODUCTION

O thou that nourishedst my young soul, Demeter,
Make thou me worthy of thy Mysteries.

Unless Aristophanes is guilty of the very fault with which literary biography as instituted by the Peripatetics has been charged—the attribution to the personality of the poet of words wrested from a dramatic situation—it is tolerably evident that he regarded Aeschylus as an initiate. But whether or not he learned the holy rites of Demeter at his native home, it was not from Eleusis, but from Marathon and Salamis, that he received the consecration that made him the expounder of the laws of God.

As an Eleusinian the poet was open to the influences of the neighbouring Athens, where one part of the chief celebration of the Mysteries was held ; and we may not underestimate the possible further stimulus given to his youthful imagination by the presence in Athens under Hipparchus, the son of Peisistratus, of men familiar with ancient hieratic poetry, oracles, and the rites of expiation, at a time of spiritual ferment when, under the influence of an uplifted religious and moral sense, men were striving to attain purity and relief from the consciousness of sin. The poet, whose works disclose few, if any, direct traces of the influence of the Mysteries of Eleusis, was undoubtedly conversant with ideas derived from the Mysteries connected with the name of Orpheus and associated with the teachings of Pythagoras. Some of his references to the judgment and punishment after death of those guilty of crime in this world are derived in all probability from Orphic sources.

¹ Aeschylus was the first of the many "enlightened" thinkers who were brought to court for their irreligion: Diagoras, Anaxagoras, Protagoras, Socrates, Stilpon, Aristotle, and Theodorus; Andocides was tried for violation of the Mysteries. Euripides had to rewrite the beginning of his Wise Melanippe.

INTRODUCTION

An embattled poet, Aeschylus saw service at Marathon in the first great encounter with the Persian invaders ; and at Salamis he may have been one of the heavy-armed troops who, under the leadership of Aristides, cut down the force stationed on the island of Psyttalea. Romance, in the desire to heighten the fame of the soldier-poet, made him take part also at Artemisium and Plataea ; and certain modern scholars, making much of the poet's references to localities and knowledge of the cults of the north, would have him participate in the Thracian campaign of Cimon (who, in 476-475, reduced the fortress of Eion commanding the mouth of the Strymon), and perhaps in some of the expeditions to recover the settlements on the Thracian coasts that continued for several years.

INTRODUCTION

Between 476 and 473 (the year before the Persians was produced) it is possible that the poet made his first visit to King Hiero. A friend of letters, and himself a judge of no little taste, that Sicilian prince had raised his court to such eminence that poets of the highest genius in the home country, Pindar, Simonides, and Bacchylides, found it convenient to accept the hospitality and the douceurs of a patron than whom none knew better the art of exacting no subservience from those acclaimed in Greece as the sovereign artists of their times. Aeschylus' first visit to the west may have been connected with the celebration incident to Hiero's re-establishment in 476-475 of the city of Etna. In the Women of Etna, the poet, leaving the highways of Pan-Hellenic mythology, found in the ancient local cults of the Sicels divine warrant for the auguries of prosperity which he drew for the founders of the city at the base of the mountain, the eruption of which in 479-478 (or, according to Thucydides, in 476-475) inspired the famous passage in the Prometheus (347 ff.) and the still more splendid description in Pindar's ode to Hiero. Aeschylus may have witnessed the eruption in person, but his picture of the scene is less vivid than that of the lyric poet; if he wrote the passage after a considerable interval, it may well be that he was deliberately entering the lists with Pindar, whose poem was composed in 470. Be that as it may, no one of his fellow-craftsmen at the Syracusan court might enter the lists with Aeschylus when he reproduced there the Persians, his battle-piece already crowned with the first prize at Athens. Aeschylus now went to Sicily not to win fame but to receive the reward of fame.

INTRODUCTION

Small wits regard the great only in the light of their own pettiness ; and Aeschylus' quitting Greece for Sicily was constantly accounted for in antiquity on the score of his having tasted the root of bitterness because other poets, Simonides and Sophocles, were preferred to himself, or because he could not brook the spirit of the times. The fable that Aeschylus retired to Sicily because of vexation at his defeat at the hands of Sophocles is as trivial as it is absurd. In the very same year in which Sophocles was victorious (468), the older poet must have been in Athens composing his Oedipodea for the dramatic festival of the next year. The cause of his departure to Sicily in 458, after the production of the Oresteia, still remains obscure. Much has been made of the possible discontent of the poet (conservative, like other great artistic minds, in his political sympathies) at the growing influence of the party opposed to Cimon. The times may well have seemed out of joint to an Athenian of the days of Aristides, and now taking the twilight view of life. A new and rash generation, lacking the old-time spirit of reverence, was forging to the front. Ephialtes, in conjunction with Pericles, had attacked the bulwark of the aristocracy, the Council of the Areopagus. The opposition, beginning with a movement leading to the expulsion of some of the members of that ancient body on the charge of peculation, culminated in an assault on its wardenship of the laws and of the formal respect due the gods that left, as the only important function of the Council, its former jurisdiction in cases of murder (462). Pericles had carried a bill providing for payment of juries, and the archons had been given a dole for daily maintenance. Political passion ran high. In 461 or 460 Ephialtes had been murdered. Ostracism, which had removed Megacles, Xanthippus, Aristides, and Themistocles, now in 461 drove Cimon from the scene of party conflict. In the Eumenides the poet, taking a position above the tumult of partisan ambitions, enforces his doctrine of reconciliation. Loyally accepting the law that had transformed the character of the Areopagus, he urges in that play a cessation of the rancorous feud of factions, and enters his solemn protest against further innovations, doubtless with reference to the proposal (made in the very year of the Oresteia) to admit to the archonship, and therewith to the Areopagus, members of the third property class. But if Aeschylus was less detached than Sophocles or Goethe from the things of the present, he may not fairly be charged with narrow partisan zeal at home. Salamis had already inspired him with Pan-Hellenic sympathies. Patriotism, national no less than cantonal, was, together with religious fervour, the inspiration of his genius.

INTRODUCTION

After all, though we cannot gainsay the possibility of the poet's discontent with the course of events at home, Aeschylus was not likely to be a man, like some moderns, to quit his fatherland in disgust. Perhaps he had no profounder urgency than to arrange for the reproduction of his last trilogy.

At Gela in Sicily the poet died in 456-455. The fine funeral epigram, which, in the spirit of the fifth century, discerns his distinction only in the citizen-soldier and not in the poet, was composed, in all probability, at Athens, and shortly after his death.

INTRODUCTION

This tomb the dust of Aeschylus doth hide,
Euphorion's son, and fruitful Gela's pride,
How tried his valour Marathon may tell
And long-haired Medes who know it all too well.¹

The recognition accorded the poet continued long after his death: the reproduction of his plays was ensured by public enactment. His tragic genius passed, in some degree, to his son and to descendants of his sister.

The identification of a noble bust in the Capitoline Museum as that of Aeschylus rests on no surer foundation than the comparison, first made by Melchiorri, with a glass paste,² which has been regarded either as allegorical, after the style of the Apotheosis of Homer, or as an allusion to the legend that the poet met his death by an eagle's letting a tortoise fall upon his bald head in mistake for a rock—a legend that appropriately found a place in Sir Thomas Browne's Vulgar and Common Errors. The Berlin gem may be modern, but the story of a tortoise thus having broken the skull of a bald-headed man was referred to by Democritus in the fifth century in his discussion of the relation of design to chance; and in some fortuitous fashion it may have been fastened on Aeschylus, though other famous personages, such as Pheidias, Hippocrates, and Diogenes, also possessed the necessary physical qualification in question.

INTRODUCTION

Aeschylus was, as Milton said of Spenser, "a sage and serious poet." If we must cast out of court any attempt to make the Capitoline bust disclose an intimation of the temperament, if not the character, of the man, his works betray some refraction of himself. They have the veritable accent of personality. The poet who conceived the Prometheus and the Oresteia must have been a man of infinite depth, whose soul was set on the great things of life—sempre il magnanimo si magnifica in suo cuore. A Puritan like Milton, we conceive him as a nature strongly virile; stern, if not austere, holding himself aloof from common ways of thought; setting a high estimate upon himself; not sullen, because he possessed humour; he resembles Ezekiel, but the Hebrew prophet does not unbend as Aeschylus unbends.

Aeschylus' first play was produced in 499, his last in 458. In all he composed at least ninety tragedies and satyr plays, united, as a rule, in groups of four. The members of the tragic trilogy were not invariably connected in subject matter or even held together by any ideal bond of the moral or spiritual interrelation of mythical themes. The poet will not have failed to preserve his freedom of treatment even after he had created the dramatic cycle. The degrees of interconnexion may well have varied; in the case of the Persians, which is interposed between dramas of legendary character, it is probable that the free form of composition was deliberately preferred. He won the first prize thirteen times and for the first time only in 484, thus disproving the truth of Joseph de Maistre's saying: Qui n'a pas vaincu à trente ans, ne vaincra jamais. Seven plays, exempted from the wrong of time, are all that remain. They represent a collection made some time after Christ, and not earlier than the second century. The Oresteia was his most famous work, and its separate members were so closely connected that the preservation of one seems to have entailed the preservation of the others. The Prometheus Bound was unique in subject and appealed to a sense of the marvellous. The Persians recorded a triumph of national patriotism; the Seven against Thebes breathed the spirit of war. Possibly the beauty of its choral odes and their lofty religious tone protected the Suppliants from loss. More celebrated works than some of the survivors disappeared—habent sua fata libelli. If we have but little of the father of tragedy, that little is distinguished by a variety which is itself a characteristic of inventive powers of the highest order.

In his earlier years, his competitors Choerilus, Pratinas, and Phrynichus stood higher in popular approval. His first victory was not won until after fifteen years of effort. Even in the period when he had become the foremost tragic poet at Athens he was stirred to emulate his rivals in fields already marked as their own. Phrynichus, who had realized the tragic possibilities of themes drawn from contemporaneous history whose pathos might form a counterpart to that of the fall of Troy, and who had depicted the capture of Miletus, anticipated him in dramatizing the disaster of the Persians, the catastrophe already effected before the opening of the play, and the scene relegated to the Orient; whereas Aeschylus handled the theme with deeper psychological insight, more telling effect and greater power to envisage the spirit of an entire nation. Phry-nichus had, too, in all probability, preceded him in dealing with the myth of the Danaïds. "Poet is heir to poet, now as of yore."

INTRODUCTION

Aeschylus' chief formal innovations consist in the reduction of the rôle of the chorus and above all in the addition of a second actor. This increase over the single actor of Thespis, in making possible the conflict of opposing wills, a more complete impersonation, and an organic advance in the action, stamps Aeschylus the true founder of the drama. Three persons (the coryphaeus included) were now available as speakers in a single scene. In the simpler plays the choral outweighs the dramatic element. In the Suppliants the chorus is the main figure, as it is to some extent in the Persians; in the Oresteia it has become a vital factor in the dramatic economy. The Suppliants is ancient tragedy still in swaddling-clothes, the Oresteia is tragedy in its full maturity. The poet had not hesitated in his older years to recognize the significance of the introduction of the third actor by the young Sophocles, audacious at his first leap into fame. "It is ever a joy for the old to learn," he said, pliant still when nearly seventy years of age. His later bettered his earlier work. His career is thus, at least in the sphere of dramatic craftsmanship, the record of a steady development of a poetic faculty inspired by genius of the highest order, a development suggesting the analogy of the greatest of English dramatists, much of whose early work consisted in refurbishing the works of other playwrights.

For his fables Aeschylus had, as his chiefest source, the large treasure-house of the epic, a mass of heroic poetry, in his age still associated with the author of the Iliad and Odyssey—poetry whose substance was the legends of the olden times, refined by the taste and magnified by the art of the wandering minstrels, appealing to the common interests of the race and deriving its sanctity by the presence therein of the gods of the national faith and the human foretypes of the national ideals. In that heroic world Aeschylus lived as the modern dramatist lives in the world of his own day and generation. Homer had come to Athens with a new insistence since the recitation of his poems had been established as a fixed feature of the Pan-Athenaic festival, inaugurated or revived by Peisistratus. The old-time ways of thought were now invaded by a stream of epic, pre-eminently Ionic legend, and of this increment to the imagination Aeschylus, together with Pindar, was the first to see the possibilities for a poetic art that was to reflect the new spirit of the age. The limitations of life through custom, law, and religion in a people largely agrarian were now confronted by the limitless fancy of their kindred across the Aegean. Homer, above all other of the older poets, set the mind of Aeschylus in motion. The legends of the national epic poet, charged with the new-born Attic spirit as yet untroubled by the critical and mocking spirit born of the development of subjective thought in the time of Euripides, were to become the means to body forth a world in which God directs the affairs of men. With Aeschylus, the myth derived from Homer forms the very fabric of his work, and not, as in Pindar, an accessory element employed to illustrate and adorn. With Aeschylus, the myth serves to instruct and to elevate; and, in its tragic setting, appealed to as wide a commonality of interest as that served by the epic, far wider than that served by the elegy or choral lyric. The epic spirit pervades Aeschylus' handling of his themes. He has epic breadth, epic vigour, epic picturesqueness. But it was not in reference to any other element than their epic substance that the poet, conscious of his indebtedness to the sovereign bard, declared that his dramas were morsels from the great banquet of Homer; as if he were one of the heroes, to whose portion, according to popular fancy, crumbs that fell from the table were assigned. Aeschylus, in fact, gave to the drama its tragic stamp by opening to it the epic domain.

INTRODUCTION

It is the distinction of Aeschylus that he discerned in the heroic tales of the epic subjects fit for tragic art. His myths are drawn by preference from the Trojan, Argive, and Theban cycles, and have their source in Iliad and Odyssey, in the Cyclical epics, in Hesiod; and at times are influenced by their modification at the hands of the choral lyrists, especially Stesichorus. His predecessors did not, it seems, favour legends taken from the story of Achilles and Odysseus; while Sophocles is more dependent than he upon Iliad and Odyssey.

Connected with the Trojan War are the Carians or Europe, which dealt with the story of Sarpedon, the son of Zeus, whom Patroclus slew in battle; the Myrmidons, Nereïds, Ransom of Hector, forming a trilogy whose themes were the death of Patroclus, the forging of the new arms of Achilles, the death of Hector and the mission of Priam to secure the body of his son, all having as their central figure the hero of the Iliad, whom Aeschylus, vying as it were with

INTRODUCTION

Homer, recognizes as a truly tragic personage. In the Psychostasia ("Weighing of Souls"), Zeus himself, who in Homer is never seen by mortal eyes, was enstaged holding aloft the balance, one scale of which bore the soul of Achilles, the other that of Memnon, while Thetis and Aurora implore his favour each for her own son. The Psychagogoi ("Raising of Souls"), Penelope, Ostologoi ("Gatherers of Bones"), and Circe, dealt with the summoning of the spirits in Hades by Teiresias, and the adventures and death of Odysseus. Other Trojan subjects found a place in the Mysians and the Telephus, in the Palamedes and in the Philoctetes.

Argive legends occupy a place of peculiar importance in the extant work. First there are two tetralogies, consisting, in the one case, of the prehistoric Suppliants, Egyptians, Danaïds, with the satyr-play Amymone; in the other, of the Agamemnon, Libation-Bearers, Eumenides, with the satyric Proteus. The Prometheus and the Seven against Thebes also have a connexion with Argos. Further, by the Nemea, Argives, Eleusinians, and by the Net-Druggers, Seriphians, Phorcydes, a group dealing with the story of Perseus.

Theban legends occur in the Oedipodea (Laius, Oedipus, Seven against Thebes, and Sphinx); and in three trilogies treating of themes connected with the orgiastic cult of Dionysus. Of these the most important was the Lycurgea, consisting of the Edoni, Bassaræ, Neaniskoi, Lycurgus, and dealing with the conflict (and possibly the reconciliation) of the religion of Apollo-Dionysus and that of Apollo-Helios championed by Orpheus. Kindred in theme are the Nurses of Dionysus, Bacchants, Xantriae, Pentheus,

INTRODUCTION

Semele, Alcmena. The Heracleidae also belongs in the Theban cycle.

Further legendary themes dealt with the story of the Argonauts, with Ajax and the contest for the arms of Achilles, the Calydonian Boar Hunt, Oreithyia, Niobe, etc. Legends extant in his own day in localities outside of Attica he collected from the mouth of the people and interwove into the Women of Aetna and Glaucus of the Sea. It is in his preference for pre-Hellenic myths and especially for superhuman subjects that the poet differs most from his successors. The birth of Dionysus and the introduction of his worship into Thrace and Thebes, had peculiar attraction for him. His large imagination was at home in the realm of the prodigious, the marvellous, and the stupendous—in the Promethea with its Titan hero; in the Psychagogoi, the Psychostasia; in the Toxotides ("Archer-Maidens"), he portrayed the offence and punishment of Actaeon; in the Phineus, the Harpies befoul the food of the hero; in the Heliades, Phaëthon drives to his ruin the steeds of the sun-god; in the Xantriae the poet did not hesitate to introduce the Queen of Heaven in the guise of a priestess. He seems to have had a fondness for creatures of the sea, such as Glaucus, the daughters of Ocean, the daughters of Phorceys, the Nereïds. Aeschylus was not content with the earth as the place of the tragic action; the scene of the Psychostasia was laid in Olympus, that of the Sisyphus, in Hades. His successors restricted the appearance of the gods and confined their epiphanies to the world of men.

Of the plays found only in fragments and not connected with the extant dramas, the most popular seem to have been the Europe, the trilogy consisting of the Myrmidons, Nereïds, and Ransom of Hector, the Lycurgesa, Philoctetes, Psychostasia, and Niobe.

INTRODUCTION

The Persians was produced in 472, the Seven against Thebes in 467, the Oresteia in 458. On internal grounds the Suppliant Maidens may be placed before the poet's first recorded victory (484); the Prometheus, either between the Persians and the Seven or between the Seven and the Oresteia.

MANUSCRIPTS

Of the extant mss. of Aeschylus (over 100 in number) the most ancient and the best (though by no means free from many and gross errors) is the Medicean, written about 1000. An independent tradition appears in certain of the later mss., which are most numerous in the case of Persians, Prometheus, and Seven against Thebes, the plays most read and studied in the Byzantine period. Of the later mss. none is earlier than 1200, a few date from the thirteenth century, while most belong to the three following centuries.

that certain of the later mss. agree with M. M¹ M² denote respectively the first and the second hand of M; m¹ indicates a later hand than M, whether that of the original scribe or that of the Scholiast (Schol. M or m). Obvious misspellings and certain other minor errors or peculiarities of M are not reported. M always uses iota adscript. Fuller information on the readings of the later mss. is given in the second edition of Hermann (1859) and in the edition of Wilamowitz (1914).

The text of Aeschylus was exposed to various forms of corruption long before the writing of the oldest extant manuscript. The autograph copy of the poet, which did not separate the words, was reproduced for the book-trade in the fifth and fourth centuries before Christ; actors' texts further disturbed the tradition; the loss of the musical notation played havoc with the more difficult choral odes; the character of the script changed from age to age; and the shifting of pronunciation affected the spelling. Not earlier, it seems, than the fourth century after Christ there came into existence a book written in uncials and on parchment, which, in addition to the text of our plays, contained a selection of the commentary thereon by the Alexandrian and later grammarians; and presented the division of the lyric parts into cola made by Aristophanes of Byzantium. In the ninth century this text, our proper archetype, was transcribed in minuscules, and in more than one copy, each faulty and each containing a somewhat different text and body of explanatory material. From one of these copies in minuscules the Medicean manuscript is derived. This manuscript, written at the end of the tenth or beginning of the eleventh century by an unlearned scribe, is full of errors of the most varied character. Apart from corruptions xxxviii

of a more serious nature, it shows falsifications due to current pronunciation, blunders derived from the earlier transcription from uncials into minuscules, omissions and alterations of the proper order of words. Some part of these blemishes were noticed and removed by the scribe of the manuscript; but a greater number was detected by a scholarly reviser, who compared the text as written with its original and, possibly, with one other text at his command. To his hand is also due the addition of interlinear glosses and of marginal interpretations in uncials (the latter often so condensed as to be obscure) and the citation of alternative readings. Sundry later hands have introduced further corrections and alterations derived in part from their sources, which range from the fourteenth to the fifteenth century, in part also from the exercise of independent judgment.

From one or more of the transcripts of the first manuscript in minuscules are derived, directly or indirectly, the oldest of the extant later manuscripts, dating from the end of the thirteenth century and from the fourteenth, which record different readings from those set forth by the Medicean. In part also these variations are due to the scribes themselves or to later scholars desirous of exhibiting their faculty of emendation. In the case of the triad—Prometheus, Seven against Thebes, and Persians, the plays of Aeschylus chiefly read and most often copied in the Byzantine period—the commentary, in the form of glosses and scholia, was enormously expanded, often overloading and confusing the original mass of annotation, and not without serious depredation of the text itself. Most independent of all the later students of Aeschylus in the Byzantine period was

Demetrius Triclinius, who, despite his grievous falsification of tradition by reason of his perverse theories of metre, at times succeeded in ridding the text of persistent errors. Modern scholarship has removed most of the minor corruptions; but it is obliged to confess that the actual words of the poet are often beyond all hope of successful restoration. The gravest disturbances of the textual tradition antedate any period from which satisfactory testimony can be produced.

The text here presented as the basis of the translation has been constructed on the following principles. The authority of the Medicean is not to be rejected except under the gravest compulsion; the readings of the later manuscripts, whether due to a tradition independent of the Medicean or to subsequent conjecture, are to be admitted only when the readings of the Medicean are untenable; and recourse is to be had to modern conjectures only when the readings of all the manuscripts are impossible or in the highest degree improbable. The Critical Apparatus thus aims to set forth, in a highly condensed form: (1) all departures of the printed text from the readings of the Medicean; (2) the discrepancies between the readings of the Medicean and those of the later manuscripts, regularly when the latter have been adopted, occasionally only when they deserve special attention; and (3) all cases when the readings of all the manuscripts have been deserted in favour of the emendations of scholars from the sixteenth century to the present day.

I am under obligation to all of the critical editors of the poet and to many of his translators.

PELASGUS, King of Argos

HERALD of the Sons of Aegyptus

Attendant Maidens.

SCENE.—A sacred precinct on the shore not far from Argos. Many images of the gods are visible whose collective worship is denoted by a common altar.

TIME.—Prehistoric.

ARGUMENT

Io, daughter of Inachus, King of Argos, was priestess of Hera, whose jealousy of her lord's love for the maiden brought upon her victim marring of mind and body; and she was driven distraught and in the semblance of a heifer made to wander over land and sea until she came to the land of the Nile. There she regained her human form by the mysterious touch of her lover Zeus, and bore a child Epaphus, from whom sprang Libya, and from her Belus and Agenor. Between Belus's two sons, Aegyptus and Danaüs, strife arose, and the fifty sons of Aegyptus wished to possess by forced marriage the fifty daughters of Danaüs. But the maidens, loathing the violence of their kinsmen, fled again with their father to Argos, the home of their primal mother, and besought sanctuary from the king of that land, Pelasgus.

The hesitation of the king to vindicate to the suppliants the right of asylum, the triumph of that right by vote of the people of Argos, the arrival of the suitors in pursuit, preceded by their herald demanding the surrender of the maidens, and his repulse though threatening war, constitute the action of the play.

The sequel was contained in the Egyptians and the Danaïds. Danaüs, forced to acquiesce in the demands of his nephews, enjoins upon his daughters the duty of killing their bridegrooms on the marriage night. All, save Hypermnestra, obey; she with splendid perfidy spares Lynceus out of love; and when brought to trial is defended by the goddess Aphrodite pleading that love of man and woman is sanctified by the love of Heaven for Earth.

The play cannot be dated with precision, but since it antedates the Persians, is unquestionably the oldest extant drama of European literature.

THE SUPPLIANT MAIDENS

[Enter a company of maidens, who have fled from Egypt and just landed on the shores of Argos; with them their father]

CHORUS

May Zeus, who guardeth suppliants, of his grace look upon our company that took ship and put to sea from the outmost land of fine sand at the outlets of the Nile. For we have fled the land of Zeus¹ whose pastures border upon Syria, and are fugitives, not indeed by public ban of outlawry pronounced for deed of blood, but by our own act to escape the suit of man, since we abhor, as impious, all wedlock with the sons of Aegyptus. It was Danaüs, our sire, author of our counsels and leader of our band, who, weighing well our course, decided, as best for our good report in a choice of evils, that we flee with all speed over the billows of the main and find a haven on Argos' shore. For thence, indeed, hath grown our race that claims to have sprung from the caressing of the gnat-tormented heifer at the hands of Zeus, and from the on-breathing of his love.

THE SUPPLIANT MAIDENS

Nay, to what land more delightsome than this could we come with these wool-wreathed branches in our hands, sole weapons of the suppliant? O realm, O land, and clear water; ye gods on high and ye nether powers, grievous in your vengeance, that inhabit the tomb; and thou, Zeus the Saviour, who art invoked third,¹ the guardian of the habitations of righteous men: receive as suppliants this band of women with the compassionate spirit of the land; but the thronging swarm of wanton men born of Aegyptus, ere they set foot upon this marshy land, do ye drive seaward—they and with them their swift barque—and there may they encounter a cruel sea with thunder, lightning, and rain-charged winds, and perish by the tempest's buffeting blasts, ere ever they lay their hands on us, their cousins, and mount unwilling beds from which Right holds them aloof.

And now I invoke, as our champion from beyond the sea, the calf begotten of Zeus, the offspring of the flower-browsing cow, our ancestress, the "caress" of Zeus by his on-breathing—and the appointed period confirmed itself in a name suited to the event, and it was "Epaphus"² that she brought forth.

THE SUPPLIANT MAIDENS

To him I cry for succour. And now in the region wherein our primal mother pastured, by recounting the story of her distress of yore, I shall for the nonce set forth trustworthy assurances to the inhabitants of the land ; and other warranty, though unlooked for, shall yet appear. And men shall come to know the truth as my tale proceeds.

Now if haply there be nigh some dweller in the land who knoweth the notes of birds, when our plaint greets his ear, he will fancy that he hears the voice of Metis, Tereus' piteous wife, the hawk-chased nightingale.

For she, constrained to leave her green leaves, ever maketh dolorous lament for her wonted haunts, and blendeth therewith the tale of her own child's doom—how that he perished, destroyed by her own hand, victim of the wrath of an unnatural mother.

Even so I, indulging my grief in Ionian strains, fret my soft cheek summered by Nile's sun and my heart unexercised in tears ; and I cull the flowers of grief, in anxiety whether there is any friendly kinsman here to champion our band that has fled from the haze-shrouded land.

THE SUPPLIANT MAIDENS

But, ye gods of our race, hearken unto me, and regard with favour the cause of righteousness; if ye grant not unto youth to have fulfilment of its unholy desires, but eagerly abhor wantonness, ye would be altogether righteous toward marriage. Even for those who flee hard-pressed from war there is an altar, a shelter 'gainst harm through awe of the powers of heaven.

But may Zeus vouchsafe that in all truth it go well with us. Whereon Zeus hath set his desire, that is hard to trace: verily it flareth everywhere, even in the gloom, howbeit attended by events obscure to mortal man.

Secure it falleth, and not upon its back, whatsoever is decreed unto fulfilment by the nod of Zeus; for the pathways of his understanding stretch dark and tangled, beyond ken to scan.

From their high-towering hopes he hurleth mankind to utter destruction; yet he arrayeth no armed violence—all that is wrought by the powers divine is free from toil. Seated on his holy throne, whence he removeth not, nevertheless in mysterious wise he maketh his thought to deed.

So let him look upon outrage wrought by men, how the old stock shoots out afresh in their wooing of us, burgeoning with thoughts of evil intent, its frenzied purpose an irresistible goad, through delusion their minds turned to folly.

Such piteous strains of woe I utter in my plaint, now shrill, now deep, blended with falling tears—strains meet (alas, alas!) for funeral wails; while yet I live, I chant my own dirge.

I invoke the grace of Apia's land of hills (for well, O land, thou canst understand my barbarous speech), and oft I lay my hands upon my Sidonian veil and rend its linen into shreds.

Sacrifices in satisfaction of vows are rendered freely unto Heaven when all fares well, if only there be escape from death. Alas, alas, perplexing troubles! Whither will this wave of trouble bear me away?

Our oars, indeed, and our timbered barque, girdled with flaxen cordage¹ to withstand the sea, sped me on by help of favouring gales, unharmed of all tempests; nor have I ground of complaint. But may the all-seeing Father stablish a kindly issue in due time—

That the mighty seed of our august mother may escape, unwedded, unvanquished, ah me, the embrace of man.

And may Zeus' pure daughter, she that holdeth in security the stately portal wall, of her gracious will, meeting my will, look upon me; and, grieved at our pursuit, come with all her might, a virgin to a virgin's aid, to deliver me—

That the mighty seed of our august mother may escape, unwedded, unvanquished, ah me, the embrace of man.

Yet, if she will not, we, a swart, sun-smitten race, with suppliant boughs will fare unto the nether Zeus, Zeus the great hospitaler of the dead; for if the gods of Olympus hearken not unto us, we will perish by the noose.

My children, ye must be prudent. A prudent captain of your voyage was your trusty old father here with whom ye came. And now that I have taken forethought also as to what may befall us here ashore, I charge you, record my injunctions on the tablets of your minds and give them good heed.

I descry a dust, the voiceless herald of a host; the axle-driven wheels are not silent in their sockets. I behold a throng, armed with shields and wielding spears, with steeds and curved chariots.

Haply they are the princes of the land come to look on us, apprised by messengers. But be it with harmless intent or whetted with savage wrath that the host urges on this array, 'twere better, damsels, in any case, to seat yourselves at yon mound sacred to the gods there assembled.¹ Stronger than a castle is an altar—'tis a shield invulnerable. Hie ye, and in reverent wise holding in your left hands your white-wreathed suppliant boughs, sacred emblems of Zeus the pitiful, make answer unto the strangers, as beseemeth aliens, in piteous and plaintive language of sore need, telling them clearly of your flight, how it was unstained by deed of blood. Above all let your speech be attended by no boldness, and let no froward glance proceed from out your tranquil eyes, even from countenances marked by a modest front. In your utterance be not forward nor yet lagging—the folk here is exceeding apt to take offence. And remember to be submissive: thou art an alien, a fugitive, and in need. Boldness of speech beseemeth not the weak.

CHORUS

Father, thy words are prudent and they fall on prudent ears. I will take heed of these wise hests of thine, and hold them in remembrance. May Zeus, the author of our race, behold us!

DANAÛS

May he indeed behold you, and with a gracious eye.

Nay, for such an act, not even in the realm of Hades, after death, shall he escape arraignment for outrage. There also, so men tell, among the dead another Zeus holds a last judgment upon misdeeds. THE SUPPLIANT MAIDENS

KING

Whence hails this band we address, attired in un-Hellenic garb and flaunting in barbaric robes and fabric of close woof? For your apparel is not that of the dames of Argos, nor yet of any part of Hellas. How ye gained courage thus fearlessly to come unto this land, unheralded and unfriended and without guides, this moves my wonder. And yet, 'tis true, I see that boughs such as suppliants bear are laid by your side before the gods assembled here—only as to this can Hellas make guess with confidence.¹ As for the rest, there is still much I should with reason have to conjecture, were there not a living voice to instruct me face to face.

CHORUS

Touching our attire, not falsely hast thou spoken. But, for my part, how am I to address thee? As commoner, as spokesman, bearer of the sacred wand,² or as ruler of the realm?

KING

On that score, make answer and speak with confidence unto me. For I am Pelasgus, offspring of Palaechthon, whom the earth brought forth, and lord of this land; and after me, their king, the race of the Pelasgi, who reap the fruits thereof, is fitly named. Of all the region through which the pure Strymon flows, on the side toward the setting sun,

THE SUPPLIANT MAIDENS

I am the lord. There lie within the limits of my rule the land of the Perrhaebi, the parts beyond Pindus nigh unto the Paeonians, and the mountain ridge of Dodona; the boundary of the liquid sea restrains my realm. The region hitherward of these confines I hold in sway.

The ground whereon we stand is Apian land itself, and hath of old borne that name in honour of a leech. For Apis, seer and leech, the son of Apollo, came from Naupactus on the farther shore and purged well this land of monsters deadly to man, which Earth, defiled by the pollution of bloody deeds of yore, caused to spring up—plagues charged with wrath, a baleful colony of swarming serpents. Of these plagues Apis worked the cure by surgery and spells to the content of the Argive land, and for reward thereafter earned for himself remembrance in its litanies.

Now that ye have my tokens, declare your lineage and speak further—yet our people brooks not long discourse.

CHORUS

Our tale is brief and clear. Argives we claim to be by birth, seed of a cow blest in its offspring. And the truth of this I shall confirm in full.

ye are rather more like to women of Libya and in no wise to those native to our land. The Nile, too, might foster such a stock, and like unto yours is the Cyprian impress stamped upon female forms by male artificers. And of such aspect, I have heard, are nomad women, who, pillion-borne, ride on steed-like camels, women dwelling in a land neighbouring the Aethiopians. And had ye been armed with the bow, assuredly I had guessed ye to be the mateless, flesh-devouring Amazons. But inform me and I shall the better comprehend how it is that ye trace your race and lineage from Argos.

boughs. Nevertheless may this cause of claimants to the friendship of our city bring no mischief in its train! And let no feud come upon the State from causes unforeseen and unforested; for of such trouble the State standeth in no need.

CHORUS

Yea, indeed, may Justice, daughter of Zeus the Apportioner, Justice who protecteth the suppliant, look upon our flight that it bring no mischief in its train. But do thou, aged in experience as thou art, learn from one of younger birth. If thou showest mercy to a suppliant . . . from a man of holiness.

KING

'Tis not, in sooth, my private house at whose hearth ye sit. If the State is stained by pollution in its commonalty, in common let the people strive to work out the cure. For myself, I will pledge no promise before I have communicated with all the citizens touching these events.

CHORUS

'Tis thou that art the State, 'tis thou that art the people. Thou, a lord subject to no judge, dost rule the altar, thy country's hearth, by thy will's sole ordinance and, enthroned in sole sovereignty, thou dost determine every issue. Beware pollution!

KING

Pollution rest upon mine enemies! But without harm I know not how to succour you. And yet again, it is not well advised to slight these supplications. I am perplexed, and fear possesses my soul whether to act or not to act and take what fortune sends.

CHORUS

Look unto him that looketh down from on high, unto him, the guardian of mortals sore-distressed, who appeal unto their neighbours, yet obtain not the justice that is their due right. Verily the wrath of Zeus, the suppliant's god, awaiteth such as will not be softened by a sufferer's complaints.

KING

If the sons of Aegyptus have authority over thee by thy country's law on the plea that they are nearest of kin, who would fain contest their claim? Thou must plead in accordance with the laws of the land thou hast quitted, that they have no authority over thee.

CHORUS

Never, oh never, may I fall subject to the power and authority of these men. To escape this marriage that offends my soul I am determined to flee, piloting my course by the stars. Take Justice as thy ally, and render judgment for the cause approved righteous by the gods.

KING

No easy matter this for judgment—make me not judge thereof. I have declared already that, ruler though I be, I will not do this thing save with the consent of my people, lest hereafter—if aught untoward should in any wise befall—the folk should say, “Thou didst honour aliens and hast wrought the ruin of thine own land.”

CHORUS

Both sides alike in this dispute doth Zeus, kindred to both in blood, survey with balance poised impartially, apportioning, as is due, unto the wicked their wrongdoing and to the godly their works of righteousness. When these things are thus equally poised, what compunction hast thou if thou workest me justice?

KING

Surely there is need of deep and salutary counsel; need for a keen-sighted eye, not o’ermuch confused, to descend, like some diver, into the depths, that to the State above all things this matter may work no mischief, and may come to a fair issue for ourselves; that strife may not seize on you for prize, nor yet that we surrender you from these seats of sanctuary, and bring upon ourselves the dire, abiding vengeance of the all-destroying god, who, even in the realm of Death, doth not set his victim free. Yea, take counsel, and, as is thy sacred duty, prove thyself our righteous champion. Betray not the fugitive who hath been impiously cast out and driven from afar.

And see me not ravished from this sanctuary of many gods, oh thou that holdest sovereign power over the land ; but recognize the men's wantonness, and beware the wrath of Heaven.

Endure not to behold thy suppliant dragged, spite of justice, from the images of the gods, like a horse by the frontlet, and to behold rude hands laid upon my fine-woven robes.

For be thou assured of this—whichsoever end thou shalt bring to pass, it remaineth unto thy children and thy house to make full payment by strict recompense.¹ Consider these righteous ordinances of God.

KING

Aye, I have considered them ; and I am driven to this cruel pass—I must take upon myself a mighty war against one side or the other. There is no escape—'tis as firmly fixed as a ship's hull drawn tight by windlasses. There is no issue without grievous hurt.

¹ The condensed phrase "pay equal (measure of) justice," though emphasizing the notion of just retribution for evil, includes that of just reward for good—the act comes back upon the doer (δράσαντι παθεῖν).

Now when goods are plundered from a homestead, other goods may come by grace of Zeus, guardian of household wealth ; so a tongue that has shot arrows

another. But to avoid shedding of kindred blood, surely there is need of sacrifice and that many a victim fall to many a god as a deliverance from impending harm. Of a truth, 'tis to my undoing that I am come into this quarrel ; and yet I am fain to be bursts on me. It is a sea of ruin, fathomless and impassable, that I have launched upon, and nowhere is there a haven from distress. For should I not effect a quittance of the debt due to you, the pollution thou namest is beyond all range of speech; yet if I take my stand before the walls and try the issue of battle with the sons of Aegyptus, your kinsmen, how will the cost not mount to a cruel price—men's blood to stain the ground for women's sake?

And yet the wrath of Zeus who guardeth the suppliant compels my reverence; for supreme among mortals is the fear of him. Do thou, aged father of these maidens, take these boughs straightway in thine arms and place them upon other altars of the country's gods, that all the burghers may see the token that ye have come in supplication. And let no random word be let fall against me; for the people is fain to complain against authority. It may well chance that some, stirred to compassion at the sight, will hate the wantonness of the troop of males, and that the people will be more friendly of intent towards you; for to the weaker cause all men are well disposed.

DANAÛS

We deem it worth much to have gained a champion who is compassionate. Yet send with me escorts and guides of the country's folk that we may find where the gods who protect your city have their altars at the temple fronts and their . . . seats, and that safety may attend our progress through

Look thou benignly upon the women's cause, love. Show that thou remembrest all, O thou who didst lay thy hand upon Io. Lo, 'tis from Zeus that we claim our line is sprung, and 'tis from this our homeland that we went forth.

Hither am I come to the prints of ancient feet, my mother's, even to the region where she was watched, the while she browsed upon the flowers—into that pasturing mead, whence Io, tormented by the gad-fly's sting, fled in frenzy, traversing many tribes of men, and in due accord with fate, cleaving asunder
the surging strait, made her bourne the land upon the farther shore.

And through the land of Asia she hurls, straight through sheep-pasturing Phrygia, and she passes hollow vales of Lydia, across the mountains of the Cilicians and the Pamphylians, speeding over ever-flowing rivers and earth deep and rich, and the land of Aphrodite that teems with wheat.

Harassed by the sting of the winged herdsman she gains at last the fertile demesne sacred unto Zeus, that snow-fed mead assailed by Typho's fury, and the water of the Nile that no disease may touch—maddened by her ignominious toils and frenzied with the pain of Hera's torturing goad.

And mortals, who in those days were indwellers of the land, shook with pallid terror at the unwonted sight as they beheld a being fearsome, half-human, part of the race of kine and part of woman; and they were astonished at the monstrous thing. And then, at last, who was it that brought soothing to the far-wandering, the wretched, the sting-tormented Io?

Zeus, it was, through endless time, the lord, . . . and by the unwounding might of his hand, and by his breath divine, she gained rest, and let fall the sorrowing shame of tears. She conceived a burden, in very truth of Zeus, and bare a blameless child, Throughout long ages blessed altogether. Whence all the earth crieth aloud, "This is in very truth the seed of life-giving Zeus; for who else could have stayed the distemper visited on her by Hera's plot?" Call this the work of Zeus and this his race sprung from Epaphus and thou shalt hit the truth.

Who of the gods hath wrought deeds that, with good reason, warrant more fairly my appeal to him? Father himself and lord, he with his own hand planted us, he the mighty fashioner of our race, he ancient in wisdom, he who deviseth all things, whose breath prospereth all things, even Zeus.

He doth not sit upon his throne by authority of another and hold his dominion beneath a mightier. None there is who sitteth above him whose power he holdeth in awe. He speaketh and it is done—he hasteneth to execute whatsoever his counselling mind conceiveth.¹

[Re-enter Danaüs]

DANAÛS

Be of good cheer, my children—on the part of the citizens all goes well. Decrees, carrying full authority, have been passed.

¹ The full force of this majestic and awe-inspiring passage, recalling the solemnity of Isaiah, can be reproduced only by paraphrase. Nearer the original is "He doth not, sitting <upon his throne> by the authority of any, bear a lesser sway delegated by superiors . . . But with him the deed is as the word to do swiftly aught of all his counselling mind conceiveth."

CHORUS

Hail, our envoy, harbinger of tidings most welcome.
But tell us—to what purport has the decision been carried, and to what course does the majority of the people's suffrages incline?

DANAÛS

Action was taken by the Argives, not by any doubtful vote but in such wise as to make my aged heart renew its youth. For the air bristled with right hands held aloft as, in full vote, they ratified this resolution into law: "That we be settlers in this land, be free, subject to no seizure, and secure from robbery of man; that no one, nor native nor alien, carry us captive; but, if recourse be had to violence, any landholder who refuses to rescue us, should both forfeit his rights and suffer public banishment." Such was the persuasive speech that the king of the Pelasgians spake in our behalf, uttering the solemn warning that never in after time should the city feed fat the wrath of Zeus, protector of the suppliant; and declaring withal that, should a twofold defilement—from strangers and from burghers at once—arise before the city, it would prove a breeder of distress past all relief. Hearing these words, the Argive folk, waiting for no proclamation of crier, decreed by uplifted hand that so it be. It was the Pelasgian people, won readily to assent, that heard the subtle windings of his speech; but it was Zeus who brought the end to pass.

CHORUS

Come, let us invoke blessings upon the Argives in requital for blessings. And may Zeus, the stranger's god, have regard to the offerings of gratitude voiced by a stranger's lips, that they may in true fulfilment reach their perfect goal.

Ye gods of heaven! Hearken now as I pour forth orisons for blessings upon our kindred. Never may the wanton lord of war, insatiate of battle-cry, destroy by fire this Pelasgian land, even Ares who reapeth a human harvest in alien fields; for that they had compassion upon us, and cast a vote in our favour, and have respect for our pitiable flock, suppliants in the name of Zeus.

Nor did they cast their suffrages upon the side of the males, holding of no account the women's cause, since they had regard unto the avenging eye of Zeus, against which there is no battling, and what house would have it upon its roof to its defiling? ¹ for heavily doth it sit thereon. For they take reverent heed of their kin, petitioners of holy Zeus; therefore with pure altars shall they gain the grace of the gods.

Therefore let there fly forth from our overshadowed¹ lips a prayer of gratitude. Never may pestilence empty this city of its men nor strife stain the soil of the land with the blood of native slain. But may the flower of its youth be uncultured, and may Ares, the partner of Aphrodite's bed, he who maketh havoc of men, not shear off their bloom.

And may the altars, whereat the elders gather, blaze in honour of venerable men. Thus may their State be regulated well, if they hold in awe mighty Zeus, and, most of all, Zeus the warden of guest-right, who by venerable enactment guideth destiny aright. And that other guardians be always renewed, we pray; and that Artemis-Hecate² watch over the child-bed of their women.

And let no murderous havoc come upon the realm to ravage it, by arming Ares—foe to the dance and lute, parent of tears—and the shout of civil strife.

¹ Overshadowed by the suppliant branches, which, though now laid on the altar (l. 507), are still in imagination held before the faces of the Maidens.

² Artemis and Hecate were identified in Attic cult as early as the fifth century B.C. Cp. Corp. Inscr. Att. i. 208. The epithet ἐκάρη "far-darter," "archer" was, it seems, not applied as a common adjective to Artemis.

THE SUPPLIANT MAIDENS

And may the joyless swarm of diseases settle far from the heads of the burghers, and to all the young folk may Lyceüs¹ be graciously disposed.

And may Zeus cause the earth to render its tribute of fruit by the produce of every season; may their grazing cattle in the fields have abundant increase, and may they obtain all things from the heavenly powers. May minstrels sing hymns of praise at the altars; and from pure lips let there proceed the chant that attends the harp.

And may the people that controls the State guard its privileges free from fear—a prudent government counselling wisely for the public weal. And ere they have recourse to arms may they inflict no loss, but grant just rights of covenant unto the stranger within their gates.

And may they worship for evermore the gods who possess the land with native honours of laurel bough upborne, and oxen slain, even as their fathers did before their time; since reverence for parents—this standeth written third among the statutes of Justice, to whom honour supreme is due.

¹ The epithet Lyceüs, often applied to Apollo, was commonly connected with the belief that he was the destroyer and protector of wolves (λύκοι). As a destructive power he is invoked to ward off enemies (Seven against Thebes, 145); as an averter of evil he protects herds, flocks, and the young. According to Pausanias (ii. 19. 3) Danaüs established a sanctuary in honour of Lyceüs at Argos, where, in later times, the most famous of all Apollo's temples was consecrated to him under the title of "Wolf-god."

THE SUPPLIANT MAIDENS

DANAÛS

I commend these, your reasonable prayers, dear children; but be not troubled yourselves when ye hear the unexpected and startling tidings your father has to tell. From my post of look-out here on the sanctuary of suppliants I descry their barque; for 'tis well-marked and escapes me not: the trimming of its sail, its side-guards, and the prow that with its eyes scans its onward course, obeying—all too well for those to whom it is unfriendly—the guiding rudder at the stern. The men on board are plainly seen, their swart limbs showing from out their white attire. The rest of the ships and all the assisting fleet stand clear in view: but the leader herself has furled her sail and draws near the shore with full sweep of sounding oars. Yet ye must face the matter calmly and with self-control, and not be unmindful of yonder gods. For my part, I will secure me men-at-arms and advocates to urge our cause, and return anon. Haply some herald or envoys may come, eager to seize on you for prize and hale you hence—but there shall be naught of this: fear them not. Yet in the event that we should be slow in bringing succour, 'twere better not for a moment to forget the means of help ye have here at hand. Courage! In good time, assuredly, and on the day ordained, he who contemns the gods shall suffer punishment.

THE SUPPLIANT MAIDENS

DANAÛS

Rarely would this profit us, my children, should they incur both Heaven's hate and yours.

[CHORUS]

Father, no fear of yon tridents or of things held sacred in the sight of Heaven will ever stay their hands from us.

Full too overweening are they, maddened, with unholy rage, shameless dogs, that hearken not unto the gods.

DANAÛS

Yet there is a saw that wolves o'ermaster dogs ; the byblus-fruit mastereth not the wheat-ear.¹

[CHORUS]

Since they have the tempers of lewd and impious beasts, we must guard against them speedily.

DANAÛS

Not speedy is a fleet in getting under way, nor yet in anchoring, when there is need to bring ashore the securing cables ; and even at anchorage shepherds of ships feel not at once secure, above all if they have arrived on a harbourless coast when the sun is sinking into night. In a cautious pilot night is wont

¹ Distinctive foods mark national differences—the Egyptians are no match for the Argives. Theophrastus, in his History of Plants, 4. 8, reports that the inhabitants of Egypt chew papyrus, raw, boiled, or roasted.

The city shall find no fault with a messenger, old in years, but with youth in his heart and on his tongue.

CHORUS

O land of hills, land of our righteous veneration, what is to be our lot? To what region in the Apian land are we to flee, if anywhere there be some dark hiding-place? Ah that I might become black smoke that draws nigh unto the clouds of Zeus; or, soaring aloft without wings, vanish quite out of sight like viewless dust and dissolve into nothingness!

The evil no longer admits of escape; my heart is darkened and a-quiver; the look-out my father held hath wrought me ruin. I am undone with terror. Rather would I meet my doom in a halter-noose than suffer the embraces of a man I loathe. Death ere that, with Hades for my lord and master!

Ah that somewhere in the upper air I might find a seat 'gainst which the dank clouds turn into snow, or some bare, inaccessible crag, outranging sight, brooding in solitude, beetling, vulture-haunted, to bear witness to my plunge into the depths ere ever I be forced into a wedlock that would pierce my heart!

Thereafter I refuse not to become a prey to dogs and a feast to the birds that make the place their home; for to be dead is to be freed from sorrow and sighing. Come death, death be my doom, before the marriage-bed! How can I even yet find some means of escape to deliver me from wedlock?

Shriek aloud, with a cry that reaches unto heaven, strains of supplication unto the gods; and do thou, O Father, give heed that they in some wise be accomplished to my safety and tranquillity. Behold deeds of violence with no kindly glance in thy just eyes! Have respect unto thy suppliants, O Zeus, omnipotent upholder of the land!

For the males of the race of Aegyptus, intolerable in their wantonness, chase after me, a fugitive, with clamorous lewdness and seek to lay hold of me with violence. But Thine altogether is the beam of the balance, and without Thee what is there that cometh to its accomplishment for mortal man?

[HERALD]

Away with you, away to the barque, fast as ever your feet can take you! Ah well then, if you won't, your hair shall be torn out; you'll be pricked with goads, and off shall come your heads with plenteous letting of gory blood. Away with you, away—and a murrain on you!—to the ships.

Who is it, am I to tell on my return, that has despoiled me of this band of women, their own cousins? THE SUPPLIANT MAIDENS

[KING]

My name? What need is there that I declare it to thee? In due course of time thou shalt learn it, thou and thy mates. As for these maids, if, convinced by god-fearing argument, they consent of their own free will and heartily, thou mayest take them. But to this purpose hath been passed a decree by the unanimous resolve of the people of the State, never, under compulsion, to surrender this company of women; through this their resolve the rivet has been driven clean, to remain fixed and fast. Not on tablets is this inscribed, nor hath it been sealed in folds of books: thou hearest the truth from free-spoken lips. Now get thee instantly from my sight!

[HERALD]

We are like, methinks, to involve ourselves anon in a new war. But may victory and authority rest with the men!

CHORUS

In blessings mayest thou abound, noble Pelasgian, in requital for thy blessings! But, if it please thee, send hither our brave father Danaüs to be our adviser and leader of our counsels. For it befits him, rather than ourselves, to advise us where we should make our abode and what neighbourhood is friendly. All the world is ready to cast reproach on those who speak a foreign tongue. But may all be for the best! [Exit the King.] And do ye, dear handmaidens, preserving your fair fame and provoking no angry utterances on the part of the native folk, take up your stations even as Danaüs has allotted her duty of attendance unto each.

[Enter Danaüs with a bodyguard]

to me they assigned this escort of spearmen, that I might have rank and honour, and might not be waylaid at unawares and perish by the death of the spear, and so an ever-living burthen come upon the land. Recipients of such boons as these, it becomes us to hold gratitude in yet higher honour in the bottom of our soul. And in addition to the many other sage injunctions of your sire recorded in your memory, do ye inscribe this withal—that an unknown company is proved by time. For in an alien's case, all the world bears an evil tongue in readiness, and it is easy lightly to utter slander that defiles. Wherefore I would have ye bring no shame upon me, now when your youthful loveliness attracts men's gaze. The tender ripeness of summer fruit is in no wise easy to protect; beasts despoil it—and men, why not?—and brutes that fly and those that walk the earth. Love's goddess makes bruit abroad of fruit bursting ripe. . . . So all men, as they pass, mastered by desire, shoot an alluring arrow of the eye at the delicate beauty of virgins. See to it, therefore, that we suffer not that in fear whereof we have endured great toil and ploughed the great waters with our barque; and that we bring no shame to ourselves and exultation to our enemies. Habitation of double sort is at our disposition—the one Pelasgus offers, the other, the city—and to occupy free of cost. These terms are easy. Only pay heed to these behests of your father, and count your chastity more precious than your life.

But to the rivers that through the land pour their gentle draught and give increase of children, with their fertilizing streams soothing its soil.

May pure Artemis look upon this band in compassion, and may wedlock never come through constraint of Cytherea. That prize be mine enemies'!

SCENE.—Susa, the residence of the Persian kings.
The action is conceived as taking place near an ancient council hall, later at the tomb of Darius.

TIME.—480 B.C., not long after the battle of Salamis.

DATE.—472 B.C., at the City Dionysia.

ARGUMENT

At the head of a mighty host gathered from the innumerable nations of his empire, Xerxes, the youthful and impetuous King of Persia, has gone forth to conquer all Greece and especially to take vengeance on Athens, at whose hands his father Darius had suffered cruel defeat at Marathon. The regents, appointed by the king on his departure, disturbed by the absence of all tidings from their army, convene (by a transparent fiction) to take counsel in solemn session as to the fortunes of their long absent lord. To them the Queen Mother resorts desiring their interpretation of a vision of the night portending disaster to her son. Urged by the Elders to make supplication to the gods and propitiate Earth and the spirits of the dead with offerings that they may ward off the evil aspect of her dream, she delays her departure to inquire of them what manner of men Athens can oppose to the forces of Persia. Scarce has she heard of their prowess than there enters in hot haste a Courier bringing the full story of the annihilation of the Persian fleet at Salamis and of the sufferings of a portion of the army on its homeward march.

The sacrifices she had designed for another purpose Atossa now performs at the tomb of her husband Darius, whose spirit, waked by the incantations of the Chorus, deprecates all further attempts at invading Greece, prophesies the defeat of the Persians at Plataea because of their insolence and sacrilege, and ascribes to infatuate folly the ruin of Xerxes, whose distressful appearance at the end of the play visibly signalizes the utter downfall of his presumptuous pride.

[Enter a band of Elders, guardians of the Persian Empire]

CHORUS

Behold this our band, called the Trusty Council of the Persians who have departed to the land of Hellas, and warders of the royal abode, rich in plenteous store of gold, whom Xerxes, our King, Darius' princely son, did himself select, by virtue of our rank and years, to be the guardians of his realm.

But touching the return of our King and of his host richly arrayed in gold, my soul within my breast, all too sorely disquieted, even now presageth disaster. For the whole force of Asia's sons hath fared forth and murmurs against its youthful King. Nor courier nor horseman arrives at the city of the Persians, who left behind them the walled defence of Susa and Agbatana and Cissa's ancient ramparts, and went forth, some on steeds, some in galleys, others on foot, with measured march presenting a dense array of war.

Such were Amistres and Artaphrenes and Megabates and Astaspes, marshals of the Persians; kings themselves, yet vassals of the Great King, they press on, commanders of a vast host, skilled to manage bow and steed, formidable of aspect and terrible in battle through the valiant resolve of their souls. Artembares, too, who battles from his chariot, and Masistres, and goodly Imaeus, skilled with the bow, and Pharandaces, and Sosthanes, who urges on his steeds. Others still the mighty, fecund Nile sent forth—Susiscanes, Pegastagon of Egyptian lineage, mighty Arsames, lord of sacred Memphis, Ariomardus, governor of world-old Thebes, and the rangers of the fens, rowers of ships, well-skilled, and in multitude past all numbering.

In their train follows a throng of luxurious Lydians, and those¹ who hold in subjection all the people of the mainland, whom Metrogathes and brave Arcteus, their kingly commanders, and Sardis rich in gold sped forth, riding in many a chariot, in ranks with three and four steeds abreast, a spectacle terrible to behold. They too that dwell by sacred Tmolus pledge themselves to cast the yoke of slavery upon Hellas—Mardon, Tharybis, anvils of the lance, and the Mysians, hurlers of the javelin. Babylon, also, teeming with gold, sends a mingled host in sweeping train, both mariners borne in galleys and bowmen reliant on their courage. The folk that wields the scimitar follows from every part of Asia at the dread mandates of the King.

Such are the warriors, the flower of the Persian land, that are departed, and in ardent longing for them the whole land of Asia, their foster-nurse, laments; while parents and wives, as they count the days, shudder at the lengthening delay.

The royal armament, dealing destruction to cities, hath ere now passed to the neighbouring land upon the adverse shore, having crossed the firth of Helle, daughter of Athamas, on a bridge of boats made fast by cables, by casting a stout-clamped roadway as a yoke upon the neck of the deep.

The impetuous lord of populous Asia is driving his wondrous warrior-flock against the whole earth in twofold armament, on foot and by the sea, resting his confidence in his stalwart and stern commanders; he himself, the peer of the gods, a hero whose race is sprung from gold.¹

¹ The hero Perseus, here regarded as the ancestor of Xerxes, and in l. 146 as giving his name to the whole Persian race, was the son of Zeus, who descended to Danaë in a shower of gold.

THE PERSIANS

Flashing from his eyes the dark glare of a deadly dragon, attended by many a soldier-band and many a mariner, and speeding his Syrian car, he leadeth against a people renowned for the spear a warlike archer host.

But none there is so proved in prowess as can make stand against a mighty flood of men and by strong barriers stem the resistless billows of the main; for Persia's host is not to be withstood and valiant of heart are her men.

For by the will of the gods Fate hath held sway since ancient days, and hath enjoined upon the Persians the pursuit of war that levels ramparts low, the mellay of embattled steeds, and the storming of cities.

And they have learned to look upon the domain of the deep when the broad-wayed sea whiteneth to foam beneath the tempest's blast, trusting in their finely wrought cables, and their devices to give passage to their host.

Yet the insidious guile of God—what mortal man shall escape it? Who with agile foot can lightly leap from out its toils?

THE PERSIANS

For Delusion, with semblance of fair intent, lureth man astray into her snares, whence it is not possible for him scatheless to escape.

Wherefore my heart is shrouded in gloom and is racked with fear (woe!) for our Persian armament, lest the State learn that the mighty capital of the Susian land is made desolate of its sons,

And lest, as bands of women cry aloud "woe," the Cissian stronghold raise a re-echoing shout responsive to the thud of hands on breast, and rending fall upon their vesture of fine linen.

For all the men-at-arms, they that urge on steeds and they that march along the plain, have left the city and gone forth, like bees in a swarm, together with the chief captain of the host; and have crossed the spur, projected into the sea and common to either continent, by which both shores are bound by a yoke.

And marriage-beds are filled with tears through longing for husbands; each Persian dame has sped forth to the field her warlike and impetuous consort, and in the tenderness of her grief and in longing for her beloved lord is left lorn of her mate.

THE PERSIANS

But come, ye Persians, let us take our station on the steps of this olden palace and devise some sage and deeply-pondered counsel (for need thereof hath come upon us) how it then fares with Xerxes our King, Darius' son, scion of our own race as his forefather's name declares. Is it the drawing of the bow that hath triumphed, or is it the might of the spear-headed lance that hath prevailed?

[Enter Atossa, gorgeously apparelled, on a chariot and attended by a numerous retinue]

But lo! here comes forth an effulgence like unto the eyes of the gods—the Mother of our King, my Queen. To her I make lowly obeisance. Meet is it also that we all address her in words of salutation.

[The Elders prostrate themselves and then rise to their feet. Their leader continues]

O Queen, most exalted of Persia's deep-girdled dames, venerable mother of Xerxes, spouse of Darius, all hail! Consort wast thou of the Persians' god, and mother art thou likewise of a god, unless perchance its ancient fortune hath now forsaken our host.

ATOSSA

For this very cause I have quitted the gold-bespangled palace and the common nuptial chamber of Darius and myself, and am come hither. My heart, too, is rent with anxiety; and unto you, my friends, will I make a disclosure, being in no wise free from an apprehension prompted by my own thoughts, lest our great wealth shall, in its headlong course, have overturned the prosperity which Darius raised on high not without the favour of some god. Wherefore a twofold thought has been pondered in my heart : neither to hold in honour vast wealth without men, and that the light does not shine, in proportion to their strength, on men without riches. Our wealth, at all events, is ample, but my alarm is for the light of my eyes—for the light of the house I deem to be the presence of its lord. Wherefore, since things stand in such case, lend me your counsel in this concern, ye Persians, my aged trusty servants. For all my hopes of good counsel depend on you.

CHORUS

Be well assured of this, our country's Queen, not twice hast thou to point out either word or deed, touching aught wherein our power is able to direct thee. For well affected to thy interests are we whom thou summonest as counsellors in these matters.

ATOSSA

I have been ever haunted by many a dream at night since my son, having fitted forth his armament, departed hence with intent to lay waste the land of the Ionians. But never yet have I beheld so distinct a vision as yesternight. I will describe it unto thee.

I dreamed that two women in fair vesture, one apparelled in Persian garb, the other in Dorian attire, appeared before mine eyes ; both in stature far more striking than are the women of our time, in beauty flawless, sisters of the self-same race. As for the country wherein they dwelt, to one had been assigned by lot the land of Hellas, to the other that of the barbarians. The twain, to my fancy, seemed to provoke each other to a mutual feud; and my son, made aware of this, strove to restrain and soothe them, and yoked them both to his car and placed the collar-straps upon their necks. The one bore herself proudly in these trappings and kept her mouth obedient to the rein. The other struggled and with her hands rent asunder the harness of the car; then, free of the curb, dragged it violently along with her and snapped the yoke asunder. My son was hurled to the ground and his father Darius stood by his side compassionating him. But Xerxes, when he beheld him, rent his garments about his limbs.

Such, I say, was the vision I beheld in the night. But when I had risen and dipped my hands in the clear-flowing water of a spring, I drew nigh unto an altar with incense in my hand, minded to make oblation of a sacrificial cake unto the divinities that avert evil, even unto those to whom these rites are due. But I saw an eagle fleeing for safety to the altar of Phoebus—and from terror, my friends, I stood reft of speech. And thereupon I spied a falcon rushing at full speed with outstretched pinions and with his talons plucking at the eagle's head; while it did naught but cower and yield its body to his foe.

These are the terrors I beheld, and terrors are they too for you to hear. For be ye well assured, my son, if he succeed, will challenge wonder; but, if he fail, he is not answerable to the State; and safe-returned, he holds this land in sway even as before.

THE PERSIANS

- CHORUS

O Mother, we would neither alarm thee unduly by our words nor yet raise thy hopes too high. But if it be aught inauspicious that thou hast seen, visit the gods with supplication and entreat them to turn aside the evil thereof, and that all good things may be fulfilled for thyself and thy children, for the realm and all thou holdest dear. Next, it is meet to offer libations unto Earth and the departed; and in propitiatory wise beseech thy spouse Darius, whom thou declarest thou hast seen in the night, to send into the light of day from beneath the earth blessings for thee and for thy son; and that the reverse of this may be held in durance beneath the earth and fade away in gloom. Such is the counsel I offer thee with kindly intent, guided thereto by the promptings of my judgment. In our interpretation of these portents, the issue will in all things prove prosperous unto thee.

ATOSSA

Assuredly hast thou, its first interpreter, read the import of my dream with goodwill, at least, toward my son and house. Aye, may the issue indeed prove prosperous! All these rites, as thou dost enjoin, when I return to the palace, will I perform unto the gods and unto those dear to me beneath the earth. Meanwhile, my friends, I would fain learn in what region of the earth Athens lies according to report.

Nay, far from it ; they have lances for close fight and shields that serve them for armour.

The words thou utterest bring a great light of joy unto my house, and bright day after night wrapped in gloom.

MESSENGER

But Artembares, commander of ten thousand horse, is dashing now against Silenia's cruel shore. And Dadaces, leader of a thousand men, leaped, spear-smitten, with nimble bound, from his ship. Tenagon, the Bactrians' chieftain of the true old stock, is ranging now around the surf-beaten isle of Ajax. Lilaeus and Arsames, and, third, Argestes, kept buffeting against its rugged strand, whirled round about the isle,¹ the breeding-place of doves. Arceus, too, who dwelt hard by the waters of the Egyptian Nile, Adeues, and third Pharnuchus of the mighty shield—all these were hurled from out one ship. Matallus of Chrysa, commander of ten thousand, leader of the Black Horse thirty thousand strong, in death dyed red his thick and shaggy beard, changing its colour with a deep purple stain. Arabus, too, the Magian, perished there, and Bactrian Artabes, a settler now in a rugged land. Amistris, and Amphistreus, wielder of his toilsome spear, and brave Ariomardus, whose death brought grief to Sardis, and Seisames the Mysian, and

THE PERSIANS

Tharybis, admiral of five times fifty ships, a Lyrnaean by descent, a comely man, lies dead all wretched in uncomeliness.¹ Syennesis, also, the governor of the Cilicians, foremost in courage, he whose single prowess wrought the foe most harm, found there a glorious death. Such were the leaders touching whom I have now made report. Sore as were our losses, yet I announce but few.

ATOSSA

Alas! The words I hear put the very crown upon our woes—a disgrace to the Persians and cause for shrill lament. But retrace thy tale and tell me clearly this: how great was the number of the ships of Hellas that gave them assurance with their armed prow to join battle with the Persian armament?

MESSENGER

Were numbers all, be well assured the barbarians would have gained the victory with their fleet. For the whole number of the ships of Hellas amounted to ten times thirty, and, apart from these, there was a chosen squadron of ten. But Xerxes, this I know, had under his command a thousand, while those excelling in speed were twice a hundred, and seven more. Such is the reckoning. Think'st thou we were outnumbered in this contest? No, it was some power divine that swayed down the scale of fortune with unequal weight and thus destroyed our host. The gods preserve the city of the goddess Pallas.

¹ The ironical phrase οὐ μάλ' εὐτυχῶς, which is contrasted with εὐειδής, probably refers to his unburied state. Cp. Soph. Aj. 1126.

Is then the city of Athens not yet despoiled ?

MESSENGER

Nay, while her sons still live her ramparts are impregnable.

ATOSSA

But the beginning of the encounter of the fleets—tell me of it. Who began the onset ? Was it the Hellenes ? Or my son, exulting in the multitude of his ships ?

MESSENGER

My Queen, some destructive power or evil spirit, that appeared I know not whence, caused the beginning of our utter rout. A Hellene, from the Athenian host, came to thy son Xerxes and told this tale : that, when the gloom of sable night should set in, the Hellenes would not hold their station, but, springing upon the rowing benches of their ships, would seek, some here, some there, to preserve their lives by stealthy flight. But Xerxes, on hearing this, not comprehending the wile of the Hellene nor yet that the gods grudged him success, straightway gave charge to all his captains to this effect—that, when the sun had ceased to illumine the earth with his beams, and darkness had covered the precincts of the sky, they should bring up in serried order the main body of the fleet, disposed in triple line, to bar the exits and the sounding straits, and station other ships in a circle around the island of Ajax ; with the warning that, should the Hellenes escape an evil doom, finding by stealth some means of flight for their fleet, it had been decreed that every captain should lose his head. So he commanded in full confidence of heart, since he knew not the issue purposed of the gods. Our crews then, with no lack of order but with an obedient spirit, prepared their evening meal, while each sailor looped his oar about its thole-pin so that it fitted well. But when the light of the sun had faded and night drew on, each master of an oar and each man versed in arms went on board. The long galleys cheered each other, line by line; and they held their course as each captain had been ordered, and all the livelong night the commanders of the fleet kept their whole force cruising to and fro across the strait. Night began to wane, yet the fleet of the Hellenes in no wise endeavoured to put forth by stealth. When, however, radiant Day with her white coursers shone over all the land, first of all from the Hellenes rang out loud a cheer like unto a song of triumph, and, at the same instant, clear from the island crags Echo returned an answering cry. Terror fell on all the barbarians, balked of their purpose; for not as in flight did in that hour the Hellenes chant their solemn paeon, but as men rushing to the onset with the courage of gallant hearts. The trumpet with its blast fired all their line; and instantly, at the word of command, with the even stroke of foaming oars they smote the briny deep. Swiftly they all hove clear into view. Their right wing, well marshalled, led on foremost in orderly advance, next their whole armament bore out against us, and at the same time a mighty shout greeted our ears: "On, ye sons of Hellas! Free your native land, free your children, your wives, the fanes of your fathers' gods, and the tombs of your ancestors. Now you battle for your all." And now from our side arose responsive the mingled clamour of Persian speech; the time brooked no delay, but instantly ship dashed against ship its bronze-sheathed beak. It was a ship of Hellas that began the charge and sheared off entire the curved stern of a Phoenician barque. Each captain drove his ship straight against some other ship. At first, indeed, the stream of the Persian armament held its own; but when the mass of our ships had been crowded in the narrows, and none could render another aid, and each crashed its bronze-faced beak against each of its own line, they shivered their whole array of oars; while the Hellenic galleys, not heedless of their chance, hemmed them in and battered them on every side. The hulls of our vessels rolled over and the sea was hidden from our sight, strewn as it was with wrecks and slaughtered men. The shores and reefs were crowded with our dead, and every ship that formed a part of the barbarian fleet plied its oars in disorderly flight. But, as if our men were tunnies or some haul of fish, the foe kept striking and hacking them with broken oars and fragments of wrecked ships; and groans and shrieks together filled the open sea until the face of sable night hid the scene. But the multitude of our disasters I could not narrate in full at thy request even were I to make a ten days' story of my tale. Be well assured of this—there never perished in a single day so great a multitude of men.

ATOSSA

Alas ! In sooth a mighty sea of troubles has burst upon the Persians and the entire barbarian race.

MESSENGER

Be well assured of this, the disaster is not as yet half told. So dire an affliction of calamity fell upon them as to outweigh these ills, aye twice over.

ATOSSA

But what fortune could have befallen yet more malign than this? Speak ! What is this other disaster thou sayest came upon our host, sinking the scale to greater weight of ill ?

MESSENGER

What Persians were in their life's prime, bravest in spirit, pre-eminent for noble birth, and ever among the foremost in loyalty unto the King himself—these have fallen ignobly by a most inglorious doom.

ATOSSA

Ah, wretched that I am, my friends, by reason of this cruel pass ! By what manner of death sayest thou they perished ?

MESSENGER

There is an island¹ fronting Salamis, small, a dangerous anchorage for ships ; and upon its sea-washed shore dance-loving Pan is wont to tread. Thither Xerxes dispatched these, his choicest troops, in order that when the Hellenic foe, wrecked from out his ships, should seek escape in safety to the island, they might slaughter his force, an easy prey, and rescue their comrades from the narrows of the sea. Grievously did he misjudge the issue. For when some god had given the glory to the Hellenes in the battle on the sea, that self-same day, fencing their bodies in armour of goodly bronze, they bounded from their ships and encircled the whole island round about, so that our men were at a loss which way to turn. Oft-time they were struck by stones slung from their hands, and arrows sped from the bow-string kept ever falling upon them and working them destruction. At last the Hellenes, charging with one shout, smote them and hacked to pieces the limbs of the poor wretches, until they had utterly destroyed the life of all. Xerxes groaned aloud when he beheld the depth of the disaster; for he occupied a seat commanding a clear view of all the armament—a lofty eminence hard by the open sea. Rending his robes and uttering a loud wail, he forthwith gave orders to his force on land and dismissed them in disorderly flight. Such, besides the one already told, is the disaster thou must bewail.

ATOSSA

MESSENGER

The commanders of the ships that still remained fled with a rush in disorder before the wind. As for the survivors of the army, they perished in Boeotian land, some distressed by thirst beside a refreshing spring; while some of us, exhausted and panting, won our way to the land of the Phocians, to Doris and the Melian gulf, where the Spercheus waters the plain with kindly stream. Thence the soil of the Achæan land and the cities of the Thes-salians received us, sore in want of food. There it was that full many perished of thirst and hunger—for we were oppressed by both. And we came to the Magnesian land and to the country of the Macedonians, to the ford of the Axius and Bolbe's reedy fens, and to Mount Pangæus, in Edonian land. But on that night the god roused winter before its time and froze the stream of sacred Strymon from shore to shore; and many a man who ere that had held the gods in no esteem, implored them then in supplication as he worshipped earth and heaven. But when our host had made an end of its fervent invocation of the gods, it ventured to pass across the ice-bound stream. And whosoever of us started on his way before the beams of the sun-god were dispersed abroad, found himself in safety; for the bright orb of the sun with its burning rays heated the mid-passage and pierced it with its flames. One upon another our men sank in, and fortunate indeed was he whose breath of life was sundered soonest. All who survived and won to safety, when they had made their way through Thrace, as they best could, with grievous hardships, escaped and reached—and few they were indeed—the land of hearth and home; so that the city of the Persians well may make lament in regret for the best beloved youth of the land. My tale is true. Yet much remains untold of the ills launched by Heaven upon the Persians. [Exit

O unearthly power, source of our cruel distress, with what crushing weight hast thou sprung upon the whole Persian race!

ATOSSA

Ah wretched that I am at the utter destruction of our host! O vivid vision of my dreams at night, how all too clearly didst thou signify misfortune unto me! And all too lightly did ye in turn interpret it. Howbeit, since your explanation determined thus, first of all I am fain to offer prayers unto the gods, and then I will return after I have brought from the palace a sacrificial cake as a gift to Earth and the departed. I know indeed that it is for what is past recall, yet in the hope that something more auspicious may befall in days to come. But for you 'tis fitting to communicate trusty rede unto the Trusty in view of what has befallen thus. And my son—should he come hither before I return—

CHORUS

O sovereign Zeus, now indeed that thou hast destroyed the armament of the high-vaunting and multitudinous Persians, thou hast shrouded in the gloom of grief the city of Susa and of Agbatana! Many a dame, having her portion in our sorrow, rends her veil with tender hands and bedews with drenching tears the robe mantling her bosom. And the Persian wives, indulging in soft wailing through longing to behold their late-wedded lords, abandon the daintily wrought coverlets of their couches, wherein their delicate youth had its joyance, and mourn with complainings that know no satiety. So I too raise the burthen of unfeigned lament for the death of those who departed hence.

For now in truth the whole land of Asia, dispeopled, maketh moan: Xerxes led forth (woe!), Xerxes laid low (woe!), Xerxes disposed all things imprudently with his sea-faring barques. Why then was Darius in his time so scatheless a lord of the bow unto his people, to the men of Susa a leader dear?

THE PERSIANS

For landsmen and seamen both, the ships, dark-eyed¹ and linen-winged, led forth (woe!), the ships laid them low (woe!), the ships, under the deadly impact of the foe and by the hands of Ionians. The King himself, as we learn, hath barely made his escape over the wintry ways that traverse the plains of Thrace.

And they who were first to meet their doom (alas!), left behind perforce (alas!), are swept along about the Cychrean strand (woe!). Groan and gnash your teeth; in grievous strain shout forth our woes till they reach the heavens (alas!), raise high your wailing clamour in cries of misery.

Lacerated by the swirling waters (alas!) they are gnawed (alas!) by the voiceless children of the stainless sea (alas!). The home, bereaved of his presence, lamenteth its head; and parents, reft of their children, in their old age bewail their heaven-sent woes (alas!), now that they learn the full measure of their afflictions.

Not now for long will they that dwell throughout the length and breadth of Asia abide under the sway of the Persians, nor will they pay further

My friends, whosoever has experience of misery knows that when a sea of troubles comes upon mortal men, they are wont to view all things with alarm; but when fortune flows with prosperous tide, to trust that the selfsame fortune will waft them success for aye. Now in my case it hath come to this: everything full of dread seems in my eyes the visitation of Heaven, and in my ears there rings a sound that has no note of joy; such is the consternation at evil tidings that affrights my soul.

'Tis for this reason that I have directed my course hither from the palace once again, without my chariot and my former pomp, and bring, as propitiatory libations for the father of my son, offerings that serve to soothe the dead, both white milk, sweet to drink, from an unblemished cow, and bright honey, distillation wrought from blossoms by the bee, together with lustral water from a virgin spring; and this

But come, my friends, do ye chant solemn songs as I make these libations to the dead, and summon forth the divine spirit of Darius, while I convey, in honour of the nether gods, these offerings for the earth to quaff.

Ye holy divinities of the nether world, Earth and Hermes, and thou, Lord of the dead, send forth to the light the spirit from below ; for if, beyond our prayers, he knoweth any further remedy for our distress, he alone of mortals can declare how to bring it to accomplishment.

Doth then our sainted and godlike king hear me as I utter, in obscure barbaric speech, these my dismal and dolorous cries of varied sort ? Or must I shout aloud the utter misery of my anguish that it pierce the earth ? Doth he hear me from below ?

the glorious spirit, the god of the Persians, whom Susa bore, may quit his abode. Send to the upper world him whose like Persian earth ne'er yet entombed.

Dear indeed was the hero, dear is his barrow ; for dear are the qualities that lie buried there. O Aidoneus, Aidoneus, thou who conveyest shades to the upper air, suffer our divine lord Darian¹ to come forth ! Ohe !

For as he neither ever caused the destruction of his folk by insensate and ruinous wars, so he bore the name of divine counsellor to the Persians ; and a divine counsellor he was, since he piloted aright his men-at-arms. Ohe !

Soldan, our Soldan of old, come forth, draw nigh ! Rise to the barrow's topmost point, lift thy saffron-dyed sandal, display the crest of thy royal tiara ! Come forth, O father Darian, thou who didst work no ill ! Ho !

That thou mayest list to pitiable and unheard-of sorrows, O Lord of our lord, appear ! For a gloom, like that of Styx, hovereth over us, since all the youth of the land is now utterly destroyed. Come forth, O father Darian, thou who didst work no ill ! Ho !

stamp of men. As I behold my consort hard by my tomb I feel alarm, and I accept her libations in kindly mood; while ye, standing near my tomb, make lament, and with shrilling cries that summon the spirits of the dead, invoke me piteously. Not easy is the path from out the tomb; for this cause above all—that the gods beneath the earth are readier to seize than to release. Nevertheless, for that I have obtained dominion among them, I am come.
But speed ye, that I may be void of blame as to the time of my sojourn. What is this unexpected ill that weighs the Persians down?

DARIUS

Nay, since the old-accustomed dread in thy mind restrains thee, do thou, high-born dame, venerable partner of my bed, cease thy tears and laments, and tell me a plain tale. Afflictions appointed unto human life must, we know, befall mankind. For many calamities from out the sea, many from out the land, arise to mortal men if their span of life be extended far.

ATOSSA

O thou who in prosperity didst surpass all mortal men by thy happy destiny, since, so long as thou didst gaze upon the beams of the sun, thou didst pass a life of felicity, envied of all, in Persian eyes a god, so now too I count thee happy in dying ere thou hast beheld the depth of our calamities. The whole tale, O Darius, thou shalt hear in brief space of time.
The power of Persia is ruined well-nigh utterly.

By both. There was a twofold front of double armament.

By artful contrivances he yoked the firth of Helle so as to gain a passage.

ATOSSA

Aye; a well proved report establishes this at least. Doubt there is none.

DARIUS

Alas! Swift indeed has come the fulfilment of the oracles, and 'tis my son upon whom Zeus hath caused their issue to descend. Yet I have been resting confident that, only after long lapse of time, the gods would in some way bring them to accomplishment; nevertheless, when man hasteneth to his own undoing, God too taketh part with him. A fountain of misfortune has now, methinks, been discovered for all I love. A son of mine it was who, in his ignorance, brought these things to pass through youthful recklessness; for he conceived the hope that he could by shackles, as if it were a slave, restrain the current of the sacred Hellespont, the Bosphorus, a stream divine; set himself to fashion a roadway of a new order, and, by casting upon it hammer-wrought fetters, made a spacious causeway for his mighty host. over all the gods, aye even over Poseidon. Must this not have been a distemper of the soul that possessed my son? I fear me lest the plenteous treasure amassed by my toil may become the prey of the spoiler.

ATOSSA

This lesson impetuous Xerxes learned by converse with the vile. For they kept ever telling him that, whereas thou by thy spear didst win plenteous treasure for thy children, he, on his part, through lack of manly spirit, played the warrior at home and made no enlargement of his father's wealth. Hearing such taunts many a time and oft from evil counsellors he planned this expedition and armament against Hellas.

DARIUS

Therefore a calamity most evil and past all forgetting has been wrought by him to its accomplishment; a calamity such as never yet befell this city of Susa to its desolation since our Lord Zeus first ordained this high estate that one ruler should bear sway over all Asia with its flocks and wield the sceptre of its government. For Medus was first to be the leader of its host; and another, his son, completed his work since his soul obeyed the direction of wise thoughts. Third, after him, Cyrus, blest in his fortune, came to the throne and stablished peace for all his people. The Lydians and Phrygians he won to his rule, and the whole of Ionia he subdued by force; for the gods hated him not, since he was right-minded. Fourth in succession, the son of Cyrus ruled the host. Fifth in the list, Mardus came to power, a disgrace to his native land and to the ancient throne; but he was slain in his palace by the guile of gallant Artaphrenes, with the help of friends whose part this was. [Sixth came Maraphis, and seventh Artaphrenes.¹] And I in turn attained the lot I craved, and many a campaign I made with a goodly host: but disaster so dire as this I brought not upon the State. But Xerxes my son, youth that he is, has the mind of youth and remembers not my injunctions. Be very sure of this, ye compeers of my age: all of us who have held this sovereign power cannot be shown to have wrought ruin so great as this.

CHORUS

What then, O King Darius? What is the goal toward which thou dost direct the issue of thy speech? How, after this reverse, may we, the people of Persia, prosper best in time to come?

DARIUS

If ye take not the field against the Hellenes' land, even if the forces of the Medes outnumber theirs. The land itself is their ally.

CHORUS

How meanest thou this? In what way "their ally"?

¹ This interpolated or corrupt verse possibly comes from a variant list of the conspirators against the Smerdis (in l. 774 called Mardus), whom the Magian rebels planned to put in the place of the real prince of that name, who was slain by his brother Cambyzes. The name Maraphis does not occur elsewhere in connection with this event, and neither he nor Artaphrenes was ever king. Herodotus names Intaphernes as the chief conspirator against the false Smerdis.

And if this be truth, it is through persuasion of vain hopes that he is leaving behind a body of picked troops. They are now tarrying where the plain is watered by the stream of Asopus that gives kindly enrichment to Boeotia's fields. Here it awaits them to suffer their crowning disaster in requital for their presumptuous pride and impious thoughts. thrown from their bases in utter ruin and confusion. Wherefore having evil wrought, evil they suffer in no less measure ; and other evils are still in store : not yet quenched is the spring of their woes, but it still wells forth. For so great shall be the mass of clotted gore spilled by the Dorian lance upon Plataean soil that heaps of dead shall make known, even to the third generation, a voiceless record for the eyes of men that mortal man needs must not vaunt him overmuch. For presumptuous pride, when it has burgeoned, bears as its fruit a crop of calamity, whence it reaps a plenteous harvest of tears.

Mark that such are the penalties for deeds like these and hold Athens and Hellas in your memory. Let no one of you, through disdain of present fortune and lust for more, squander his abundant wealth. Zeus, of a truth, is a chastiser of overweening pride and corrects with heavy hand. Therefore, now that my son has been warned to prudence by the voice of God, do ye instruct him by admonitions of reason to cease from drawing on himself the punishment of Heaven by his vaunting rashness. And do thou, beloved and venerable mother of Xerxes, withdraw to the palace and fetch thence vesture such as is seemly for him, and prepare to meet thy son. For through grief at his misfortunes, the embroidered apparel that covered his person has been utterly rent into tattered shreds. Do thou soothe him with words of kindness ; for it is to thy voice alone, I know, that he will endure to listen. As for me, I depart to the darkness beneath the earth. And what a number of cities he captured !—without crossing the stream of Halys or even stirring from his own hearth : such as the Acheloan¹ cities on the Strymonian sea that neighbours the Thracian settlements.

And those outside the mere, the cities on the mainland, compassed with embattled walls, obeyed him as their king ; those, too, that exult in their site on both sides of the broad stream of Helle ; and Propontis, deeply-recessed, and the outlet of Pontus.

The sea-washed isles, also, off the projecting arm of the sea, lying close to this our land, such as Lesbos, and olive-planted Samos, Chios and Paros, Naxos, Myconos, and Andros that as a close neighbour lies adjacent to Tenos.

And he held under his sway the sea-girt isles midway between the continents, Lemnos, and the settlement of Icarus, and Rhodes, and Cnidos, and the Cyprian cities Paphos, Soli, and Salamis, whose mother-city is now the cause of our lament.

¹ If "Acheloan" is used, as some report, only of fresh water, the poet may have in mind the pile-dwellings of the Paeonians on Lake Prasias (mentioned by Herodotus, v. 16) ; if "Acheloan" includes also salt water, the reference may be to the islands off Thrace—Imbros, Thasos, and Samothrace.

THE PERSIANS

And the rich and populous cities of the Hellenes in the Ionian demesne he controlled by his own will; and at his command he had an unwearied strength of men-at-arms and of allies from every nation. But now, worsted signally in war through disasters on the sea, we suffer in no doubtful wise this change of fortune from the hand of God.

[Enter Xerxes in tattered robes, and attended by a scanty retinue

XERXES

Alas, wretched am I that I have encountered this cruel doom that gave no faintest sign it could befall! In what savage mood hath Fortune trampled upon the Persian race? What misery is yet in store for me, unhappy wretch? The strength of my limbs is loosened as I behold this aged company of burghers. Ah, Zeus, would that the doom of death had buried me, too, together with the men who are laid low!

CHORUS

Alack, O King, for our gallant armament, for the high honour of Persia's rule, and for the fair array of men now cut off by Fate!

The land bewaileth her native youth, slaughtered for Xerxes, who hath gorged the realm of Death

Behold me, alas, meet subject for your lamentation, in misery, born, it hath proved, a bane to my race and fatherland.

To hail thee on thy return home I will send forth the ill-omened cry of woe, the voice, versed in lamentation, of a Mariandynian¹ mourner, a wail fraught with many a tear.

SCENE.—A rocky height, overlooking the ocean, in the uttermost parts of Scythia.

TIME.—Mythical.

DATE.—Uncertain (the official statement is lost).

ARGUMENT

WHEN Cronus, the son of Uranus, was king in heaven, revolt against his rule arose among the gods. The Olympians strove to dethrone him in favour of Zeus, his son; the Titans, children of Uranus and Earth, championing the ancient order of violence, warred against Zeus and his partisans. Prometheus, himself a Titan, forewarned by his oracular mother Earth or Themis (for she bore either name) that the victory should be won by craft, whereas his brethren placed their sole reliance on brute force, rallied with her to the side of Zeus and secured his success. His triumph once assured, the new monarch of heaven proceeded forthwith to apportion to the gods their various functions and prerogatives; but the wretched race of man he purposed to annihilate and create another in its stead. This plan was frustrated by Prometheus, who, in compassion on their feebleness, showed them the use of fire, which he had stolen in their behoof, and taught them all arts and handicrafts. For this rebellion against the newly-founded sovereignty of Zeus, the friend of mankind was doomed to suffer chastisement—he must pass countless ages, riveted to a crag on the shores of Ocean in the trackless waste of Scythia.

But suffering of body or of mind might not quell his spirit, though he is possessed of the sad privilege of immortality. Conscious that he had erred, he is nevertheless fortified by indignation that he had been made the victim of tyranny and ingratitude. Nor is he unprovided with a means to strengthen his resistance and to force the hand of his oppressor, whose despotic power has one point of attack. The Titan is possessed of a fateful secret which must be revealed to Zeus if he is not to be hurled from his dominion as his father had been before him. The despot contemplates marriage with Thetis, and should it be brought to pass, the son to be born to him is to prove mightier than his sire. This secret, told Prometheus by his mother, he will not disclose till, in the lapse of ages, Zeus consents to release him from his ignominious bonds; rather than part with it on other terms he defies the thunder and the lightning of the lord of Olympus and, amid the crashing world, is hurled to Tartarus, to the last protesting against the injustice of his doom.

POWER

To earth's remotest confines we are come, to the Scythian tract, an untrodden solitude. And now, Hephaestus, thine is the charge to observe the mandates laid upon thee by the Father—to clamp this miscreant upon the high-beetling crags in shackles of binding adamant that cannot be broken. For thine own pride, even flashing fire, source of all arts, he hath purloined and bestowed upon mortal creatures. Such is his offence; wherefore he is bound to make requital to the gods, that so he may be lessoned to brook the sovereignty of Zeus and forbear his championship of man.

HEPHAESTUS

Power and Force, for you indeed the behest of Zeus is now fulfilled, and naught remains to stay you. But for me—I cannot nerve myself to bind amain a kindred god upon this rocky cleft assailed by cruel winter. Yet, come what may, I am constrained to summon courage to this deed; for 'tis perilous to disregard the commandments of the Father.

Lofty-minded son of Themis who counselleth aright, against my will, no less than thine, I must rivet thee with brazen bonds no hand can loose to this desolate crag, where nor voice nor form of mortal man shall meet thy ken; but, scorched by the sun's bright beams, thou shalt lose the fair bloom of thy flesh. And glad shalt thou be when spangled-robed night shall veil his brightness and when the sun shall scatter again the rime of morn. Evermore the burthen of thy present ill shall wear thee out; for thy deliverer is not yet born.

Such guerdon hast thou gained from thy championship of man. For, god though thou art, thou didst not quail before the wrath of the gods, but didst bestow honours upon mortal creatures beyond their due. Wherefore on this joyless rock thou must stand sentinel, erect, sleepless, thy knee unbent. And many a groan and unavailing lament thou shalt utter; for the heart of Zeus is obdurate, and everyone is harsh whose power is new.

POWER

Well, why dally and vent in vain thy pity? Why dost thou not detest a god most hateful to the gods, since he hath betrayed thy prerogative to mortals?

¹ Such etymologizing "play" (Pro-metheus, Fore-thought) was a serious matter to the Greeks, who found in the name of a person a significant indication of his nature or his fate. Unlike Shakespeare, Aeschylus saw nothing even half-humorous in such etymological analysis; and elsewhere, in playing on the names Apollo, Clytaemestra, Polynices, the nomen is an omen.

come upon me unforeseen. My allotted doom I needs must bear as lightly as I may, knowing that the might of Necessity brooketh no resistance. Yet to be silent or not silent about this my fate is beyond my power. For it is because I bestowed good gifts on mortals that this yoke of constraint hath been bound upon me to my misery. I hunted out and stored in fennel stalk the stolen source of fire that hath proved to mortals a teacher in every art and a means to mighty ends. Such is the offence for which I pay the penalty, riveted in fetters beneath the open sky.

Ha! Hold! What murmur, what scent wingeth to me, its source invisible, heavenly or human, or blent of both? Hath there come to this crag at the confines of the world someone to stare upon my sufferings—or with what intent? Behold me, an ill-fated god, immanacled, the foe of Zeus, me who have incurred the enmity of all who resort unto the court of Zeus, by reason of my too great love for mankind. Ha! What's this? What may be this rustling stir I hear again hard by, of birds? The air whirs with the light rush of pinions. Whatever approaches is fraught with alarm for me.

CHORUS

Bold art thou, and batest not a jot for all thy bitter pangs, and thou givest too much licence to thy tongue. But my soul is agitated by piercing fear, and I am in dread about thy fate, wondering to what haven thou must steer thy barque to see an end of thy voyage of sorrow. For inexorable are the ways of Cronus' son and his heart is hardened against entreaty.

PROMETHEUS

I know that Zeus is harsh and keepeth justice in his own hands; but nevertheless one day he shall be mild of mood, when in that wise¹ he hath been crushed. Then, calming down his stubborn wrath, he shall at last come into bond and amity with me, eager no less to welcome him.

CHORUS

Unfold the whole story and declare to us upon what charge Zeus hath taken thee that he thus visits thee with ignominious and bitter outrage. Instruct us, unless, indeed, there be some harm in telling.

PROMETHEUS

Painful is it to me even to tell the tale, painful to keep it silent—my case is hapless every way.

them, some bent on casting Cronus from his seat that Zeus, forsooth, might reign; others, eager for the contrary end, that Zeus might never win mastery over the gods—then it was that I, albeit advising them for the best, was unable to persuade the Titans, children of Heaven and Earth; but they, disdaining counsels of craft, in the pride of their strength thought to gain the mastery without a struggle and by force. Full oft my mother Themis, or Earth (one form she hath but many names), had foretold to me the way in which the future was fated to come to pass—how that it was not by brute strength and not through violence, but by guile that those who should gain the upper hand were destined to prevail. For all that I set this forth by argument to them, they did not deign even to regard my advice one whit. Therefore of what was then before me the best choice seemed to be that I, joining my mother with me, should range myself, a welcome volunteer, on the side of Zeus; and it is by reason of my counsel that the cavernous gloom of Tartarus now hides ancient Cronus and his allies withal. Such profit did the tyrant of Heaven have of me and with such foul return as this did he make requital; for it is a disease that somehow inheres in tyranny to have no faith in friends.

However, touching your question for what cause he torments me, this I will now make clear.

Soon as ever he had seated himself upon his father's throne, he forthwith assigned to the deities

But of wretched mortals he took no heed, but desired to bring the whole race to nothingness and to create another, a new one, in its stead. Against this purpose none dared make stand save I myself—I only had the courage; I saved mortals so that they did not descend, blasted utterly, unto the house of Death. Therefore am I bent by so grievous tortures, painful to suffer, piteous to behold. I that gave mortals first place in my pity, I am deemed unworthy to win this pity for myself, but am thus mercilessly disciplined, a spectacle that shames the fame of Zeus.

'Tis easy for him who keeps his foot free from harm to counsel and admonish him who is in misery. Myself I knew all this the while. Of mine own will, aye, of mine own will I erred—gainsay it I cannot; In succouring mortals I found suffering for myself; nevertheless I thought not to be punished thus—to waste away upon cliffs in mid-air, my portion this desolate and drear crag. And now, I pray ye, bewail no more my present woes; alight on the ground and listen to my oncoming fortunes that ye may be told them from end to end. Consent, I pray you, oh consent. Take part in the trouble of him who is now in sore distress. Of a truth, affliction wandereth impartially abroad and alighteth upon all in turn.

hear thee, though throned afar, high in the heavens, so that thy present multitude of sorrows shall seem but childish sport. But, oh wretched sufferer, put away thy wrathful mood and try to find releasement from these miseries. Perchance this advice may seem to thee an outworn saw; but such plight as thine, Prometheus, is but the wages of too vaunting speech. But not even yet hast thou learned humility, nor dost thou bend before misfortune, but wouldst rather add still other ills to thy present store. Therefore take me as thy teacher and kick not against the pricks, seeing that a harsh ruler now holds sway who is accountable to none. So now I will depart and try if haply I may be able to release thee from these sufferings. And do thou hold thy peace and be not too blustering of speech. Or, for all thy exceeding wisdom, dost thou not know full well that chastisement is inflicted on a froward tongue?

So far I thank thee now and shall never cease to thank thee; for in zeal thou lackest naught. But trouble not thyself; for vain and not helpful to me will be thy trouble—if trouble thou art fain perchance to take. Nay, hold thee quiet and keep thyself clear of harm. For if I am in sore plight, I would not therefore wish affliction to be the lot of all the world. No, indeed, no! since, besides, I am distressed by the fate of my brother Atlas, who, towards the west, stands bearing on his shoulders the pillar of heaven and earth, a burthen not easy for his arms to grasp. Pity moved me, too, at the sight of the earth-born dweller of the Cilician caves curbed by violence, that destructive monster of an hundred heads, impetuous Typhon. He withstood all the gods, hissing out terror with horrid jaws, while from his eyes lightened a hideous glare, as though he would storm amain the sovereignty of Zeus. But upon him came the unsleeping bolt of Zeus, the swooping levin brand with breath of flame, which smote him, frightened, from his high-worded vauntings; for, stricken to the very heart, he was burnt to ashes and his strength blasted from him by the lightning bolt. And now, a helpless and a sprawling bulk, he lies hard by the narrows of the sea, pressed down beneath the roots of Aetna; whilst on the topmost Knowest thou not then, Prometheus, that words are the mediciners of a disordered temper?

¹ The eruption of Aetna in 479/8 B.C. is also described in a famous passage of Pindar (Pyth. i. 21 ff., written in 470 B.C.), which Aeschylus has here in mind. The lyric poet dwells on the physical aspect of the eruption by day and night; the dramatist, on the damage done to the labour of the husbandman.

CHORUS

I mourn over thee, Prometheus, by reason of thy hapless fate. Shedding from my eyes a coursing flood of tears I wet my tender cheeks with their moist streams. For Zeus, holding thus direful sway by self-appointed laws, displayeth towards the gods of eld an overweening spirit.

Now the whole earth crieth aloud in lamentation; . . . lament the greatness of the glory of thy time-hallowed honour, the honour that was thine and thy brethren's; and all mortals that make their dwelling-place in holy Asia share the anguish of thy most lamentable suffering;

And the dwellers in the land of Colchis, the maidens fearless in fight; and the Scythian multitude that tenants the uttermost region of the earth bordering the Maeotic lake;

And the flower of Arabia in arms, that holdeth the high-cragged citadel hard by Caucasus, a hostile host that roareth in the mellay of sharp-pointed spears.

Aye, and numbers, too, chiefest of sciences, I invented for them, and the combining of letters, creative mother of the Muses' arts, wherewith to hold all things in memory. I, too, first brought brute beasts beneath the yoke to be subject to the collar and the pack-saddle, that they might bear in men's stead their heaviest burdens; and to the chariot I harnessed horses and made them obedient to the rein, to be an adornment of wealth and luxury. 'Twas I and no one else that contrived the mariner's flaxen-winged car to roam the sea.

more at the arts and resources I devised. This first and foremost: if ever man fell ill, there was no defence—no healing food, no ointment, nor any draught—but for lack of medicine they wasted away, until I showed them how to mix soothing remedies wherewith they now ward off all their disorders. And I marked out many ways whereby they might read the future, and among dreams I first discerned which are destined to come true; and voices baffling interpretation I explained to them, and signs from meetings by the way. The flight of crook-taloned birds I distinguished clearly—which by nature are auspicious, which sinister—their various modes of life, their mutual feuds and loves, and their consortings; and the smoothness of their entrails, and what colour the gall must have to please the gods, and the speckled symmetry of the liver-lobe; and the thigh-bones, enwrapped in fat, and the long chine I burned and initiated mankind into an occult art. Also I cleared their vision to discern signs from flames, erstwhile obscure. So much then touching these arts. Now as to the benefits to men that lay concealed beneath the earth—bronze, iron, silver, and gold—who would claim to have discovered them before me? No one, I know full well, unless he were fain to babble idly. Hear the sum of the whole matter in the compass of one brief word—every art possessed by man comes from Prometheus.

PROMETHEUS

Bethink ye of some other theme, for 'tis in no wise meet time to discourse of this. At every hazard this must be kept concealed; for 'tis by safeguarding it that I am to escape my ignominious bonds and outrage.

CHORUS

Never may Zeus, the dispenser of all things, set his power in conflict with my will, nor may I be slow to approach the gods, with holy sacrifices of oxen slain, by the side of the ceaseless stream of Oceanus, my sire; and may I not offend in speech; but may this rule abide in my heart and never fade away.

Sweet it is to pass all the length of life amid confident hopes, feeding fat the heart in glad festivities. But I shudder as I look on thee, racked by tortures infinite. For thou hast no fear of Zeus, Prometheus, but in self-will dost reverence mortals overmuch.

See now, my friend, how bootless was thy boon. Tell me, what succour for thee is there, and where, in creatures of a day? What aid? Didst thou not behold the helpless infirmity, no better than a dream, wherein the purblind generation of men is shackled? Never shall the counsels of mortal men transgress the ordering of Zeus.

This is the lesson I have learned from beholding the fate, Prometheus, that has wrought thy ruin.

PROMETHEUS BOUND

wandering course? Wherein, O son of Cronus, wherein hast thou found offence in me that thou hast bound me to this yoke of misery—ah me! and dost thus harass a wretched maiden to frenzy by the terror of the pursuing gad-fly? Consume me with fire, or hide me in the earth, or give me to the monsters of the deep to devour; and grudge me not, O Lord, the boon that I implore. Enough of discipline have my far-roaming wanderings taught me, and I cannot discern how to escape my sufferings. Dost thou hear the voice of the horned virgin?

PROMETHEUS

How can I fail to hear the maiden frenzied by the gad-fly, the daughter of Inachus? She it is who fires the heart of Zeus with passion, and now, through Hera's hate, is disciplined perforce by wandering interminable.

Io

How comes it that thou voicest my father's name? Tell me, the hapless maid, who art thou, unhappy wretch, that thou thus rightly dost address the miserable maiden, and hast named the heaven-sent plague that wastes and stings me with its maddening goad. Ah me!

PROMETHEUS BOUND

In frenzied bounds I come, driven by torturing hunger, victim of Hera's vengeful purpose. Who of the company of the unfortunate endure—ah me!—sufferings such as mine? Oh make plain to me what misery it is my fate yet to suffer, what remedy there is, or what cure, of my affliction. Reveal it, if thou hast the knowledge. Oh speak, declare it to the hapless, wandering virgin.

PROMETHEUS

I will tell thee plainly all that thou art fain to know, not weaving riddles, but in simple language, even as is right to open the lips to friends. Behold, I whom thou seest am Prometheus, that gave fire unto mankind.

Io

O thou who hast shown thyself a common benefactor of mankind, wretched Prometheus, for what reason dost thou suffer thus?

PROMETHEUS

I have but just now done with lamenting my own calamities.

Io

Thou wilt not then vouchsafe this boon to me?

PROMETHEUS

Say what boon it is that thou dost crave; for thou canst learn all from me.

Io

Since thou art bent to have it so, speak I must.
Hear me then.

CHORUS

Nay, not yet. Grant us too a portion of the pleasure. Let us first inquire the story of her affliction and let her with her own lips relate the events that brought upon her sore calamity. Then let her be instructed by thee as to the toils still to come.

PROMETHEUS

'Tis for thee, Io, to grant this favour unto them—and for this cause above all, that they are the sisters of thy sire. For 'tis worth the while to indulge in weeping and in wailing over evil fortunes when one is like to win the tribute of a tear from the listener.

Io

I know not how I may refuse you. Ye shall learn in truthful speech all that ye would further know. Yet I am ashamed even in telling of the storm of calamity sent of Heaven, of the marring of my form, and of the source whence it swooped upon me, wretched that I am.

For visions of the night, ever haunting my virgin bower, sought to beguile me with seductive words, saying: "O damsel greatly blest of fortune, why tarry in thy maidenhood so long when it is within thy power to win a union of the highest? Zeus is inflamed by thee with passion's dart and is eager to unite in love with thee. father's flocks and where his cattle browse, that so the eye of Zeus may find respite from its longing."

By such dreams was I, to my distress, beset night after night, until at last I gained courage to tell my father of the dreams that haunted me. And he sent many a messenger to Pytho and Dodona-ward that he might discover what deed or word of his would find favour with the gods. But they returned with report of oracles, riddling, obscure, and darkly worded. But at the last there came an unmistakable utterance unto Inachus, charging and commanding him clearly that he must thrust me forth from home and native land to roam at large to the remotest confines of the earth; and, if he would not, a fiery thunderbolt should come from Zeus that would utterly bring to naught his whole race.

Yielding obedience to such prophetic utterances of Loxias, he drove me forth and barred me from his house, against his will and mine; but the curb of Zeus constrained him so to act perforce. Forth-with my form and mind were distorted, and with horns, as ye see, upon my front, stung by a sharp-fanged gad-fly I rushed with frantic bounds to Cerchnea's sweet stream and Lerna's spring. But the earth-born herdsman, untempered in his rage, even Argus, followed ever close upon me, peering with his many eyes upon my steps. But a sudden death reft him of life at unawares; while I, still tormented by the gad-fly, am driven on from land to land before the heaven-sent scourge.

Such is the tale of what befel; and if thou canst

First, from this spot, turn thyself toward the rising sun and wend thy steps over untilled plains; and thou shalt reach the Scythian nomads, who dwell, perched aloft, in wattled houses on strong-wheeled wains, and are accoutred with far-darting bows. Approach them not, but keeping thy feet nigh the rugged strand, whereon the sea breaks with a roar, pass on beyond their land. On the left hand dwell the workers in iron, the Chalybes, and of them thou must beware, since they are savage and not to be approached by strangers. Then thou shalt reach the river Hybristes,¹ which does not belie its name. Do not cross this—for it is hard to cross—until thou comest to Caucasus itself, loftiest of mountains, where from its very brows the river pours out its might in fury. The Amazons will guide thee on thy way right gladly. Next, just at the narrow portals of the mere, thou shalt reach the Cimmerian isthmus. This thou must leave with stout heart and pass through the channel of Maeotis; and ever after among mankind there shall be great mention of thy passing, and it shall be called after thee the

Is it by his consort that he shall be dethroned?

PROMETHEUS

Aye, since she shall bear a son mightier than his sire.

Io

And hath he no means to avert this doom?

PROMETHEUS

No, none—except it were I, released from bondage.

Io

Who then is to loose thee against the will of Zeus?

PROMETHEUS

It is to be one of thine own lineage.

Io

How sayest thou? A child of mine release thee from thy misery?

Even so—the third in descent after ten generations.

walks the sun, crossing the surging sea until thou reachest the Gorgonean plains of Cisthene, where dwell the daughters of Phorcys, ancient maids, in number three, of shape like swans, possessing one eye amongst them and a single tooth; upon them neither doth the sun with his beams look down, nor ever the nightly moon. And near them are their winged sisters three, the snake-haired Gorgons, loathed of mankind, whom no one of mortal kind shall look upon and still draw breath. Such is the peril that I bid thee guard against. But now hearken to another and a fearsome spectacle. Beware the sharp-beaked hounds of Zeus that bark not, the gryphons, and the one-eyed Arimaspians folk, mounted on horses, who dwell about the flood of Pluto's¹ stream that flows with gold. Approach them not. Then thou shalt come to a far-off country of a swart race that dwells by the waters of the sun, where is the river Aethiop. Follow up along its banks till thou reach the cataract, where, from the Bybline mountains, Nile sends forth his hallowed and sweet stream. He will conduct thee on thy way to the three-angled land of Nilotis, where, at last, it is ordained for thee, O Io, and for thy children to found thy far-off colony.

If aught of this is indistinct to thee and hard to understand, do thou question me yet again, and gain a clear account; for I have more leisure than I crave.

CHORUS

If there be aught still remaining or passed over of her direful wandering that thou hast to tell, oh speak. But if thou hast told all, grant us in turn the favour we request—and belike thou hast it still in memory.

PROMETHEUS

She hath now heard the full end of her journeyings; yet that she may know that what she hath heard from me was no vain tale, I will describe the toils she has endured ere she came hither, giving this as a sure proof of my account.

Yet most of the weary tale I shall leave out and come to the very close of thy wanderings.

For when thou didst reach the Molossian plains and the sheer ridge that encircles Dodona, where is the prophetic seat of Thesprotian Zeus and that marvel, passing all belief, the talking oaks, by which thou clearly, and in no riddling terms, wast saluted as the renowned spouse of Zeus that was to be (does aught of this make appeal to thee?), thence, stung by the gad-fly, thou didst rush along the pathway by the shore to the great gulf of Rhea, wherefrom thou art tossed in backward-wandering course; and for all time to come a recess of the sea, be well assured, shall bear the name Ionian, as a memorial of thy crossing unto all mankind.

These, then, are the tokens to thee of my understanding, to show that it discerneth more than has been made manifest. The rest I shall declare to you and her in common, returning to the track of my former tale.

There is a city, Canobus, on the utmost verge of the land at the very mouth and silt-bar of the Nile. There at last Zeus restores thee to thy senses by the mere stroke and touch of his unterrifying hand. And thou shalt bring forth swart Epaphus,¹ thus named from the manner of Zeus' engendering; and he shall gather the fruit of all the land watered by the broad-flowing Nile. Fifth in descent from him, fifty maidens shall return to Argos, not of their own free choice, but fleeing marriage with their cousin kin; while these, their hearts ablaze with passion, like falcons following hard on doves, shall come in pursuit of wedlock unlawful to pursue; but God shall grudge them enjoyment of their brides. Pelasgian soil shall offer the maids a home, when, in the watches of the night, their husbands have been slain by a deed of daring wrought by women's murderous blows. For each bride shall reave her lord of life, dyeing a two-edged sword in his blood—in such wise may Love come upon mine enemies! But one among the maidens shall love's desire so charm as not to slay her mate; rather the edge of her resolve shall be blunted; for of two evil names she will make her choice to be called coward rather than murderess. She it is that shall give birth in Argos to a royal line—to set this forth at large hath need of long discourse; of her seed, however, shall be born a man of daring, renowned with the bow, who shall deliver me from Ah, sage, sage in sooth, was he who first pondered this truth in his mind and with his tongue gave it utterance—that to marry in one's own degree is far the best, and that neither among them that are puffed up by riches nor among them that are mighty in pride of birth should marriage be desired by him who toileth with his hands.

Never, oh never, august Fates, may ye behold me the partner of the bed of Zeus, and may I be wedded to no bridegroom who descends to me from heaven. For I shudder when I behold the loveless maiden-

But to me, when marriage is on equal terms, it is no cause of dread; and never may the love of the mightier gods cast on me its irresistible glance. Yea, verily, the day will come when Zeus, howbeit stubborn of soul, shall be humbled, seeing that he purposeth a marriage that shall hurl him into oblivion from his sovereignty and throne; and then shall straightway be fulfilled to the uttermost the malison his father Cronus imprecated as he fell from his ancient throne. Deliverance from such ruin can no one of the gods show him clearly save only myself. I know it and the means thereof. So let him sit there in his assurance, putting his trust in the crash reverberating on high and brandishing in his hands his fire-breathing bolt. SCENE.—The Acropolis of Thebes, in which stand altars and images of various divinities.

TIME.—Prehistoric.

DATE.—467 B.C., at the City Dionysia.

ARGUMENT

It had been thrice foretold by Apollo, the lord of Delphi, unto Laius, the King of the Cadmeans, that if he would save his kingdom he must die without offspring. But Laius followed the perverse counsels of his nature and disobeyed the voice of God : he begat a son, whom he would have exposed to his death on Mount Cithaeron ; but the babe was rescued by a shepherd who bore him to Corinth, where he grew to manhood, believing himself to be the son of the king of that land, although in fact he had only been adopted by him being childless. But coming to misdoubt his parentage, Oedipus journeyed to Delphi to seek the truth ; and when the god declared that he should slay his own father and marry his own mother, he sought to flee such a fate and betake himself far from the land wherein he thought his father and his mother dwelt. But it befell as the god had said : on the way he met and slew, unbeknown to himself, his father Laius : he came to Thebes, destroyed the monster Sphinx that made havoc of the land, married the Queen, even his mother, and begat two sons, Eteocles and Polynices, and two daughters, Antigone and Ismene. But when the truth stood revealed, his mother-wife hung herself, and Oedipus stabbed his eyes that they might not look on the misery he had wrought. And it came to pass that his sons, who ruled in his stead alternately, each the space of a year, treated him sore ill, so he cursed them and declared that they should divide their inheritance by the sword. Eteocles would not suffer his brother to have his time to rule; and to enforce his right Polynices, who had fled to Adrastus, King of Argos, and married the daughter of that prince, mustered a host and sought to take his native town.

At this point the action of the play begins. Warned by the seer Teiresias that the Argives are bent on a supreme assault, Eteocles heartens the burghers, quells the outcries of the daughters of Thebes, frantic at their impending danger, and receives the tidings from a scout that the enemy is advancing against the seven gates. To each of the opposing chieftains as they are described by the scout Eteocles opposes a worthy antagonist, nor will he himself hold back from encountering his brother when he learns that he is to attack the seventh gate. The curse of his father must not stand before a soldier's honour. And so the brothers fell, each by the other's hand, and the curse of Oedipus and the warning of Apollo to Laius were fulfilled.

Burghers of Cadmus, to say what the hour demands, is the part of him who guards the fortunes of the State, guiding the helm upon the stern, his eyes not closed in slumber. For should success be ours, we owe it to Heaven; but if, on the other hand—which God forbend!—disaster should befall, Eteocles would be the one name on many a citizen's tongue, bruited up and down the town in mutterings and laments. From this may Zeus the Averter, true to his name, defend the city of the Cadmeans!

But it is your part now—both his who still falls short of the full vigour of youth, and his who, past the period of youth, yet strives to cherish a sturdy growth of body, and for each man still in his prime, as befits his strength—'tis for you to succour the city and the altars of your country's gods that their worship may never be blotted out; to succour your children too, and Mother Earth, your nurse most dear. her kindly soil, to found homes and bear the shield, and prove yourselves true men in this hour of need. And, as the case now stands, until to-day Heaven inclines to our cause; for though we have been this long time beleaguered, by the will of the gods the war in the main goes well. But now, as the seer, the shepherd of birds, informs us, pondering in ears and mind, with no help from fire, the omens of prophecy with unerring skill,—he, master that he is of such means of divination, declares that the fiercest assault of the Achaeans is proclaimed in nightly council, and that they will devise plans for the capture of our city. Hasten, all of you, to the battlements and gateways of our bulwarks. Gird all your armour on and speed ye. Man the parapets and take your stand on the platforms of the towers. Bide in good courage at the outlets of the ports, and fear not over much the crew of invaders. God will give a happy issue.

For my part I have dispatched scouts and men to spy their force, and they, I feel assured, are not gone on a bootless quest. When I have heard their report I shall in no wise be ensnared by stratagem.

Eteocles, most noble prince of the Cadmeans, I am returned, bearer of sure intelligence of the movements yonder in the host, myself eyewitness of what has passed. Seven warriors, impetuous leaders of their companies, shedding a bull's blood into a black-bound shield, and touching with their hands the victim's gore, have sworn an oath by Ares, by Enyo,¹ and by bloodthirsty Rout, that they will bring destruction on the city of the Cadmeans and ravage it by force of arms, or in death imbrue this land of ours with their blood. And on Adrastus' chariot they were suspending last tokens of themselves, destined for their parents at home. Tears they shed thereby, but no note of lamentation passed their lips; for there breathed in them a spirit of iron resolve, glowing with valour, as in lions with battle in their eyes. And thy learning of these tidings is not delayed by fearfulness; for I left them casting lots how each, his post assigned by chance, should lead his company against the ports. Therefore marshal thee amain our bravest warriors, the city's best, at the outlets of the gates. For already, hard at hand, the Argive host in full array is advancing and speeds onward, while white foam flecks the plain with drops from their chargers' panting breath. Do thou then, like the careful helmsman of a ship, bulwark the town ere the blasts of war break over it in storm; for on the dry land there roars a surge of armed men. To this effect do thou seize such moment as is speediest. On my part, for what's still to come, I will keep a wary eye on watch by day, and thou, apprised by true report of what takes place without, shalt be safe from harm. [Exit

O Zeus and Earth, and ye gods that guard our city, and Curse,² the potent spirit of the vengeance

¹ Enyo is a personification of war, and hence sometimes called the mother or the daughter of Ares.

² The curse pronounced by Oedipus against his two sons (cp. 785 ff.) is a daemonic power, here identified with the vengeance it calls into being.

of my sire, do not, I entreat ye, extirpate in ruin utter and complete, with ravage by the foe, a city that speaks the speech of Hellas, and our hearths and homes. O may they never constrain in slavery's yoke a land of freedom and the town of Cadmus! But show yourselves our strength. Methinks it is our common cause I urge. For a State that prospers pays honours to its gods.

[Exit Eteocles, with citizens. The Chorus enters in fearful agitation]

CHORUS

In my terror I utter loud cries of woe. The host is let loose. Leaving their camp, lo! yonder stream, in full tide, the horsemen coursing in the van. I know it by the dust seen high in air—a speechless, yet clear and truthful harbinger.

And now the thud of hoofs upon my native plains brings the din close to my ears; it flies, it roars like a resistless torrent lashing the mountain-side.

Ah, ah, ye gods and goddesses, with your war-cry above our walls fend off the on-rushing horror!

The host of the white shield, ready for battle, rushes at full speed against the town.

Who then can rescue, who then can succour us, what god or goddess?

Shall I throw myself at the feet of the images of our ancestral gods?

Ah me, ye blessed ones throned in security, 'tis high time to clasp your images. Why do we delay, and wail thus o'ermuch? Hear ye, or hear ye not, the clashing shields? When, if not now, shall we place about them sacred robes and coronals in supplication?

A clash! I mark it. 'Twas not the clatter of a single spear. What wilt thou? Wilt thou abandon thine own land, O Ares, thou that hast dwelt therein of old? O God of the golden casque, look, O look upon the town thou didst erstwhile take for thy well-beloved!

Ye gods, who guard our country, O come all! Behold a band of maidens in supplication to be saved from slavery. Round about the town seethes a human wave of slanting crests, sped on by the blasts of Ares. Yet, O father Zeus, thou all-perfecter, deliver us altogether from capture by the foe.

The Argives encircle the fortress of Cadmus, terror of their weapons of war bewilders us, yea, the bits set in the horse's jaws clatter destruction. And seven doughty chieftains, conspicuous above the throng in spear-brandishing harness, take their stand at the gates each according to his lot.

Thou, too, O Zeus-born Power that lovest battle, O Pallas, prove thyself the saviour of the city! And thou, Lord of steeds, ruler of the deep, with thy weapon that speareth the fish, O Poseidon, grant us deliverance, aye deliverance, from our terrors!

THE SEVEN AGAINST THEBES

Thou too, Ares (oh the pity of it!), guard the town that bears the name of Cadmus and let thy presence prove thy kinship and thy care¹! And thou, Cypris, since thou art the primal mother of our race, ward off the foe! For from thy blood are we sprung. Invoking thee with orisons wherewith men call upon the gods, we draw nigh unto thee.

Thou too, Lord of the Wolf,² prove thyself a wolf unto the host of the foe, and requite groan for groan!

And thou, O maiden, Leto's child, prepare thy bow!

Ha! Ha! The rattle of the chariots round the town, I hear it. O Lady Hera! The naves creak beneath the axles' load. O beloved Artemis! The air maddens with hurtling spears! What betides our city? What is to come? And to what that lies beyond doth Heaven lead on the issue?

Ha! ha! To the height of our battlements comes the hail of stones. O beloved Apollo! There is a din of bronze-bound shields at the ports. O child of Zeus with whom is the divine authority that decides war when battle rages! And thou, sainted Queen Onca,³ on behalf of the city defend thy habitation of seven gates!

¹ κῆδος means both "kinship" and "care." The wife of Cadmus was Harmonia, daughter of Ares and Aphrodite.

O ye gods all potent to save, ye gods and goddesses that have full power to guard the bulwarks of our land, abandon not to a host of alien speech our city that now bears the brunt of war. Hearken, O hearken, righteously, unto maidens who stretch out their hands unto you in prayer.

O dear divinities, take your stand round the city as its saviours and show that ye hold it dear. Take thought of a people's offerings, and as ye take thought succour us. Be mindful, I beseech ye, of our city's lavish rites of sacrifice.

ETEOCLES

You, I ask, insufferable creatures that ye are! is this the best course to save the town, does this hearten our beleaguered soldiery—to fling yourselves before the images of the gods that guard the city and shout and shriek and make decent folk detest you? Neither in evil days nor in gladsome prosperity may I have to house with womankind. Has she the upper hand,—'tis insolence past living with; but, if seized with fear, to home and city she is a still greater bane. So now, by thus hurrying to and fro in flight, in your clamour ye have spread craven cowardice among^r the townsfolk. The fortunes of the foe without are thus aided best, while we are ruined from within by our own selves. Verily you may expect such troubles if you house with women—

This utterance likes me better than thy words that went before. Aye, and more than this—quit thy place about the images and make the better prayer : “ May the gods fight on our side ! ” And now first hear my vow, and then ring out the loud and solemn cry of jubilation, our Grecian wont of sacrificial shout heartening to our friends, and remove the terror of battle.

And now [here Eteocles makes his vow] “ To the guardian gods of our country, whether they haunt the plain or keep watch over the market-place, to betide me?—others hurl jagged stones upon the burghers pelted on every side. O ye gods of race divine, with all your power rescue our city and her men-at-arms, the sons of Cadmus!

What more delightful plot of earth will ye exchange for this, if ye abandon to its foe this deep-soiled land and Dirce's water, most healthful of all streams poured forth by Poseidon, who upholds the earth, and by Tethys' children? Therefore, O gods that protect the city, so hurl panic upon the foe without our battlements that they fling away their arms and perish in slaughter; and earn thereby glory for yourselves in our burghers' eyes. O save our city and stablish yourselves securely in your fair seats therein in answer to our prayers fraught with shrill laments!

For piteous it were thus to hurl to destruction a city of olden time, made slave and booty of the spear, in dust and ashes laid by Heaven's decree and ignominious ravage of Achaean men. Piteous, too, for her captive daughters (ah me, ah me!), young and old, to be haled by their hair, like horses, while their raiment is rent about them. A city made desolate waileth as the captive spoil is borne off to its doom 'mid mingled cries. Grievous in truth is the fate my fear forebodes.

Woeful it is for modest maidens, plucked all unripe, before the nuptial rite, to pass on a detested journey from their homes. Nay, the dead, I trow, have a happier fate than they. Aye, for many and wretched are the miseries (alas, alas!) when a city is taken. Man drags off man, or slays, or carries fire; the whole city is befouled with smoke. Mad, inspiring to frenzy, slaying the people, defiling holiness is war.

Tumult reigns through the town, against it advances a towering net of ruin. Man encounters man and is laid low by the spear. For the babes at their breast resound the wailing cries of young mothers, all streaming with blood.* Kindred are the prey of scattering bands. Pillager encounters pillager; the empty-handed hails the empty-handed, fain to have a partner, all greedy neither for less nor equal share. Good reason is there to surmise the issue of deeds like this.

THE SEVEN AGAINST THEBES

Store of every sort, strewn upon the ground as it may chance, is cause for grief, a sorry sight for housewives' eyes. In wild confusion the plenteous gifts of earth are swept along in streams of wastefulness. Young women, enslaved, suffer a new misery. Theirs it is to expect a captive's woeful bed, bed as of a happy mate but a triumphant foe's—the coming of the nightly rite to alleviate her tears and anguish!¹

I will describe—from knowledge that is sure—the disposition of the foe, how at the gates each man hath his post by lot. Tydeus already is storming before the Proetid gate ; yet the seer suffers him not to pass the Ismenus because the omens from the sacrifices do not promise fair. But Tydeus, mad with passion and eager for the fray, makes outcry like to a serpent's hiss at noonday, and lashes the wise seer, Oecles' son, with the taunt that a craven spirit makes him cringe before death and battle. Uttering such shouts, he shakes three overshadowing crests, his helmet's mane, while from beneath his shield within bronze-wrought bells peal forth a fearsome clang. On his shield he beareth this presumptuous device—a sky of cunning workmanship, ablaze with stars, and in the centre of the buckler shines, most revered among the stars, the bright full moon, the eye of night. Raving thus in his vaunting garniture, he shouts upon the river-bank, lusting for the fray, like some charger that, panting in fury against the bit, chafes while it awaits the trumpet's blare. Whom wilt thou post as his antagonist? Who hath thy trust to stand as champion at the Proetid gate when the barriers are loosed?

ETEOCLES

On me a man's resplendent trappings work no terror. Nor hath blazonry power to wound—crests and bell bite not without the spear. And for this "night," which, thou sayest, is set upon his shield and glitters with the stars of heaven, mayhap a man's folly might prove prophetic unto him. For should in death "night" fall upon his eyes, then to its bearer this vaunting cognizance of his might rightly and justly answer to its name; and 'tis to his own undoing it will prove that he thus insolently maketh prophecy. Now for my part, against Tydeus I will post as defender of this port the trusty son of Astacus. Right nobly born is he, and he holds in reverence the throne of Honour and detests boastful speech. Laggard in deeds of shame, yet no dastard, is he wont to be. From the Heroes of the Dragon's blood whom Ares spared, his stock is sprung, and a true scion of our soil is Melanippus. As for the issue, Ares with his dice will determine that; but Justice, his true kin in blood, sends him forth, charged to ward off the foeman's spear from the mother that gave him birth. [Exit Melanippus]

CHORUS

Now may the gods grant that our champion have good success, as in a just cause he speedeth forth to battle for his country! But I shudder to look upon the blood-stained deaths of men fallen for their folk.

SCOUT

Aye, even as thou prayest, may the gods grant him good success!—For the Electran gate Capaneus hath drawn his lot: another giant he, overtopping him named afore: but his vaunting speech betokens thoughts too proud for man, and against our battlements he threatens horrors,—which may Fortune not bring to pass! For whether Heaven wills or wills it not, he vows he will make havoc of the city and that even the rival fire of Zeus, though it crash upon the earth in his path, shall not stay his course. As for lightning-flashes and the thunder's bolts, he likened them to rays of heat at midday. For blazon he hath a man, a fire-bearer, armourless, save that in his hands for weapon a torch blazes ; and in letters of gold he saith " I will fire the town." Against such a warrior do thou send—who will meet him in the fray ? Who will abide his onset, his heart not turned to terror at his boasting ?

ETEOCLES

Here too is gain added with interest unto gain.¹ The tongue in sooth proveth true accuser of men's reckless thoughts ; and Capaneus utters threats, well prepared to act, dishonouring the gods ; and in vain glee plying his tongue to its full strength, sends up to heaven—mortal that he is—his surging boasts to be heard of Zeus. But right sure am I that upon him, as he well deserves, will come that fire-bearer, the thunder's bolt, no whit changed into the likeness of the sun's hot rays at midday. Against him, arrant boaster that he is, has been posted a warrior fiery of spirit, even valiant Polyphontes, a trusty guard by favour of protecting Artemis and with the aid of other gods. Say on—another, and the gate that has fallen to his lot !

[Exit Polyphontes]

CHORUS

Perish the braggart who vaunteth loud against the city ! May the thunder's bolt stay him ere ever he burst into my home and with o'erweening spear despoil my maiden bower !

SCOUT

Now I will tell of him who next drew his station at the gates. To Eteocles, as third, the lot to hurl his band against the Neistan port leaped third from out the upturned helm of goodly bronze. His mares, in eagerness to fall at once upon the gate, chafe in their frontlet-bands as he wheels them to and fro; their muzzle-gear, filled with the breath of their proud nostrils, pipes in outlandish style. In no paltry fashion hath his shield been blazoned. A man in armour mounts a ladder's rungs to his foeman's fortress, bent on its destruction, and he also cries aloud, in words their letters frame, that even Ares could not hurl him from the battlements. Against him likewise do thou send one upon whom thou canst rely to avert from our city the yoke of slavery.

ETEOCLES

Here is the man whom on the instant I would send—and he's fortune's choice, methinks. [Exit Megareus.] Lo, already he is gone, with his two hands to do his bragging, even Megareus, Creon's seed, of the race of the Dragon's blood. Not one step will he stir him from his gate, daunted by the noisy snorting of rampant steeds; but either he will by death pay the full charge of his nurture to his native land, or he will capture even two warriors and the fortress on the shield, and with his spoils bedeck his father's house. Another and his boasting!—and stint me not thy tale.

CHORUS

O champion of my home, I pray that fortune may be propitious unto him and hostile unto them. As in the frenzy of their souls they utter arrogant boasts against the city, so may Zeus, the Awarder, turn upon them an eye of wrath!

SCOUT

Another, the fourth, hath as his station the port nigh unto Onca Athena, and advances with a shout—Hippomedon, stately in shape and of mighty bulk. And as he whirled round his mighty orb ('tis the circle of his buckler I mean) a shudder came upon me—gainsay it I cannot. No sorry craftsman sure was he, the blazoner, who wrought this work upon the shield—Typhon, belching from his fire-breathing mouth a murky smoke, flame's flickering sister; and the encircling casing of his hollow-bellied orb is made fast to its ground by intertwining snakes. The champion himself has shouted his battle-cry, and inspired by Ares, raves, like a Bacchant, for the fray, flashing terror from his glance. Well must we guard against the assault of such a warrior, for already at the port Terror makes its vaunt.

ETEOCLES

First Onca Pallas, whose abode is nigh, hard by the port, loathing the arrogance of man, will fend him off, like a chill snake from a nestling brood. To match him, man to encounter man, Hyperbius, Oenops' trusty son, was chosen; for he is minded to make trial of his fortune in the stress of need—in form, in spirit, and in the fashion of his arms, without reproach. Fitley hath Hermes¹ confronted them; for the man is at enmity with the man whom he will face, and hostile to each other are the gods upon their shields whom the twain will bring to battle. The one hath Typhon breathing fire, while on Hyperbius' shield sitteth, firm and ready, Father Zeus, in his hand a bolt ablaze; and never yet, I trow, hath man seen Zeus o'erthrown. Such then on either side is the favour of the powers divine: with the victors are we, they with the vanquished, if Zeus, in truth, is mightier in battle than Typhon. And it is like that the mortal champions too should fare even as their gods; and so to Hyperbius, in accordance with his blazon, Zeus will prove a Saviour, for that he is set upon his shield. [Exit Hyperbius]

CHORUS

Full sure am I that the antagonist of Zeus, since he beareth on his buckler the unloved form of the earth-born power, a semblance loathed of men and of the long-lived gods, will lay low his head before our port.

he holds in higher honour than a god and as more precious than his eyes; and by it he swears an oath that verily he will lay waste the city of the Cadmeans spite of Zeus himself. So speaks the fair-faced offspring of a mother that dwells among the hills—a warrior, half man, half boy, and along his cheeks the down is but now spreading, youth's earliest crop, the thick upspringing hair. Savage of heart, in no wise suited to his maiden name,¹ and grim of glance, he now advances; nor indeed doth he take his stand at the gate without his vaunt; for on his bronze-wrought buckler, his body's orb'd defence, he kept ever swinging to and fro our city's shame, the raw-devouring Sphinx, a burnished and embossed figure, cunningly riveted thereon. A man she bears beneath her, a Cadmean, so that this warrior may be chief target of our missiles. 'Tis like that, once arrived, he will do no petty trading in the fight, nor bring shame upon his long journey's course—Parthenopæus, of Arcadia. Of such sort is the man, and to make full payment for his goodly nurture unto Argos, wherein he dwelleth as an alien guest, he now utters such threats against our ramparts. May Heaven fulfil them not!

ETEOCLES

Oh! would they might but get from Heaven the things whereof they dream, themselves with all their unhallowed boastings; full surely then in utter ruin and in utter misery would they be destroyed. the thing to do,—Actor, brother to him I named before. He will not suffer words without deeds to pour within his gate and foster mischief, nor will he grant entrance to one who, on his foeman's shield, bears the image of a monstrous and abhorred beast. lips: "Of a truth is such a deed as this well pleasing unto Heaven, and to thy fame for men in days to come to hear and tell of—that thou dost ravage the city of thy sires and the gods of thine own race by hurling upon them an invading host? The mother's fount¹—what righteousness shall drain it dry? The fatherland—how shall it, through thy ambition vanquished by the sword, join its cause with thine? As for me, I shall enrich this earth, sepulchred, a seer, beneath a foeman's soil. Let us fight! I look for no inglorious death." In this wise spake the seer, holding at rest his buckler all of bronze. Blazon was there none upon its orb—for his resolve is not to seem the bravest, but to be; and he reaps the harvest of his mind's deep furrowing, whence his sage counsels spring. Against him I would have thee send an antagonist both wise and brave. To be dreaded is he who reveres the gods.

ETEOCLES

Out upon the fortune of mortals that brings together the just man with the unrighteous! In every issue naught is more evil than evil partnership—the fruit thereof must have no garnering. The field of infatuation yields as its harvest death. It may be that the godly man, embarked together with sailors hotly bent on some piece of villainy, perishes along with the heaven-detested crew; or, in the other case, though just himself, if that he consorts with fellow-citizens who hate all strangers and remember not the gods, he falls, beyond his due, into the selfsame snare and is tamed when smitten by Heaven's impartial lash.

Even so the seer, Oecles' son, a man sagacious, just, brave, and godly, a wise interpreter of Heaven's will—leaguings, against his better reason, with unholy, bold-mouthed men, who proceed in long train upon the road that is far to retrace¹—shall, by the will of Zeus, be dragged down in ruin along with them.

I have, therefore, no thought that he will even attack the gates : not that he lacks mettle or because he is craven of spirit, but he knows that it is his doom to meet his end in the fray, if there is to be fruitage unto the prophecies of Loxias—and he is wont either to keep silent or to speak what the hour demands. Howbeit, to encounter him, we will oppose a warrior, stalwart Lasthenes, a warder surly unto strangers at the city's doors. Old is he in mind, but his flesh is at its prime, his eye quick to direct his foot, nor does he let his hand tarry for his spear to strike whatever is uncovered by the shield. Yet 'tis Heaven's gift for mortals to succeed.

[Exit Lasthenes]

CHORUS

Hearken, ye gods, to our supplications in a righteous cause, and vouchsafe their fulfilment, even that fortune be with our city, and avert war's horrors from us upon the invaders of our land ! May Zeus smite and slay them with his bolt outside the walls !

THE SEVEN AGAINST THEBES

SCOUT

Last I must report of him at the seventh gate,¹ the seventh champion, thine own brother, and what fate he imprecates and invokes upon the city. He prays that, his foot set upon her walls, proclaimed as conqueror in the land, after raising a wild shout of triumph at its overthrow, he then may close with thee, and if he slay thee, perish at thy side, or, if thou escapest with thy life, that he may requite thee in the self-same wise with exile even as thou didst thus dishonour him with banishment. Such menaces he shouts forth, and he calls upon the gods of his race and fatherland to have regard unto his prayers—a violent Polynices in very sooth. A buckler he bears, well-rounded and newly-wrought, with a twofold blazon cunningly fixed thereon; for a being in woman's form, advancing with modest mien, conducts a warrior in armed guise, fashioned in beaten gold. Justice, it seemeth, she declares herself, as the legend runs: "And I will bring back unto his home this man and he shall have a country, and shall range in his father's halls."

Such is the nature of the devices of their champions. [Do thou forthwith determine for thyself whom thou must send.] Thou shalt find no fault with me for my report; but it is thy part alone to judge how thou must steer the ship of State. [Exit] their fruit in deeds.—But it beseems me not either to weep or wail, lest a grief harder yet to bear be brought to birth. As for him so fitly named—this Polynices—we shall know anon to what end his blazonry will come; whether gold-wrought letters babbling upon his shield, along with witlessness of soul, shall bring him home. Had Justice, the virgin daughter of Zeus, attended his actions and his thoughts, this might perchance have been. But as it is, neither when he fled the darkness of his mother's womb, nor in his nurture, nor ever when he grew to youthful manhood, nor when the hair was gathering on his chin, did Justice accost him and claim him as her own. Nor yet again do I think that now, when he does outrage to his fatherland, doth she stand by his side, his champion. Aye, verily, Justice were all justly false in name were she to consort with one all-daring in his purpose. In this I put my confidence and will go forth and face him—I myself. Who else hath a claim more just? Chieftain against chieftain, brother against brother, foe against foe, I will take my stand. Quick, my greaves to fend off spear and stone!

CHORUS

Ah no, dearest of men, thou son of Oedipus, show not thyself like in temper unto him who utters such dire words. Nay, 'tis enough for Cadmeans to come to close grapple with Argives; for of that blood there is expiation. But death dealt thus one to other by two of one blood—of that pollution there is no growing old.

If indeed man should suffer ill, let it be clear of dishonour; for that counts as the sole gain when men are dead. But of ill coupled with dishonour thou canst not say aught that's good.

CHORUS

For what art thou so eager, child? Let not mad lust for battle fill thy soul and carry thee away. Cast from thee the evil passion at its birth.

Since Heaven so urgently presses on the event, let all the race of Laius, that hath incurred Phoebus' hate, drift adown the wind, apportioned to Cocytus' wave!

I shudder in terror at the power divine, unlike all other gods, that bringeth desolation upon homes, that forebodeth woe unerringly, the Avenging Spirit invoked by a father's prayer. I shudder at its working fulfilment of the imprecation uttered in excess of wrath by Oedipus distraught. This strife, deadly to his sons, stirreth it to work.

A stranger it is that apportioneth their inheritance, the Chalyb that hath come, a settler here, from Scythia, a ruthless distributor of wealth, even savage-hearted steel that hath allotted them as¹ land wherein to dwell even so much as may be theirs to hold in death—disportioned of these wide demesnes.

kindred hands in mutual slaughter, and the dust of earth hath drunk their black and clotted gore, who can provide wherewith to purify? Who can wash away their stain? O house of misery, wherein new woes are blent with woes of old!

Aye, of ancient time is the transgression I recount, and swift its retribution: yet unto the third generation it abideth; ever since Laïus—in defiance of Apollo's hest, albeit He thrice declared at Pytho, earth's central shrine, that he must die without offspring would he save his realm—

Ever since he, overborne by the perverse counseling of his nature, begat doom unto himself, even Oedipus, the son who slew his sire; the same who sowed his seed in a hallowed field, his mother's womb, where he was nurtured to life,—and he came to endure a growth of blood. Madness it was that linked the infatuate pair.

And now a sea of troubles, as it were, driveth on its billows; as one wave sinks, another, of triple crest, it reareth aloft, even that which now seethes about the ship of State. Narrow the space that stretches between as a defence—no, wider than a wall. I am fearful lest, with our princes, our city be o'erthrown.

THE SEVEN AGAINST THEBES

For heavy is the settlement of curses uttered long ago when they come to their fulfilment; and the fatal account, once it is there, passeth not away. The wealth of gainful men, when grown too gross, is heaved overboard from the bottom of the hold.

For who of men was ever so admired of gods and of those that share with them the city's hearth, the thronged gathering of men, as Oedipus was honoured that day when he freed the land of that deadly pest whose prey was man?

But when, to his misery, he came to know aright his ill-starred bridal, sore grieving at his pain, with frenzied heart he worked a twofold ill: with the hand that had slain his sire he reft him of his eyes, dearer to him than his own children.

And against his sons, because of their cruel tendance, he launched malisons of wrath (ah me! malisons of bitter tongue)—even that they with sword in hand should in time to come divide his substance. But now I tremble lest the Spirit of Vengeance with hurrying pace may work their accomplishment.

triumph that no scathe hath befallen the safety of the city, or am I to bewail our warrior chiefs, hapless, ill-starred, and childless? All too true to their name, and "men of much strife" indeed, have they perished through their impious intent.

O black curse inherent in the race, the curse of Oedipus, that hath now worked its full completion! A chill of anguish falls upon my heart. 'Tis for a tomb I frame my song, inspired by frenzy when I hear of their death by an evil doom and of their corpses bedabbled in blood. Mournful, indeed, is this Song of the Spear.¹

It hath worked out its end nor hath it wearied—the sentence imprecated by their sire. Laius' resolve, made in disobedience, hath held its course; and I am anxious for our city—the warnings of Heaven lose not their edge.

[The funeral procession with the bodies of the brothers comes into view]

O fraught with sorrows! Ye have wrought in this a deed passing all belief. Woes meet for groans have come in very truth.

Yon spectacle hath no need of interpreter: that whereof the messenger made report is here before our very eyes. Twofold our distress—disasters twofold of warriors slain each by the other's hand, these woes of double doom now come to fulfilment. Ah, what words have I wherewith to name them? What else indeed save sorrows born of sorrows that haunt the hearth?

But come, my friends, adown the wind of your sighs, ply with your hands about your heads the speeding stroke,¹ which alway over Acheron wins passage for the dark and sable-sailed mission-ship unto the shore whereon Apollo sets not foot nor sunlight falls, unto the shore invisible, the bourne of all.

But soft! Here come Antigone and Ismene for their sad office—to chant the dirge over their brothers twain. Not in insincerity of grief, methinks, will they pour forth their sorrow in fitting strain from their fair, deep-bosomed breasts. But it is meet for us, ere their voice be heard, to raise the dismal chant of the Avenging Spirit and to sing thereto the hateful triumph-song of Death.

Ah, sisters most unhappy in your brethren of all women who clasp their girdle about their robes! I weep, I moan, my shrill strains come from my very heart in all unfeignedness.

Alas, alas, ye misguided ones, whom friends could not persuade, nor misfortune tire, who to your ¹ As the souls of the brothers are now being conveyed across Acheron in Charon's boat, the Chorus in imagination aid their passage by the ritual of mourning. Their song of lamentation stands for the wind, the beating of their heads by their hands are the strokes of the oars. Contrasted with the grim vessel that transports all spirits to the sunless land of Hades is the ship that goes to the festival at Delos, the "clearly-sun" island, the land of Apollo, god of light and health.

misery have, by your prowess, won ruinous possession of your father's house !

To their misery, indeed, they won for themselves
a miserable death in the havoc of their house.

Alas, alas, thou who wouldst have razed to the ground the walls of thy home, and thou who wouldst have seen thyself—to thy bitter sorrow—sole lord, now at length are ye reconciled by the help of steel.

The awful Avenging Spirit of Oedipus, your sire, hath worked right true fulfilment.

Smitten through your left sides, aye, smitten indeed—those sides that sprung from the selfsame womb ! Alas, afflicted of Heaven ! Alas, the curse with death requiting death !

Smitten, even as thou sayest, were they by a blow thrust home to house and life, through wrath unspeakable, and by the doom invoked by their sire's curse, the doom they shared without discord.

Through the city too passeth the sound of lamentation ; the battlements lament ; the land that loveth its sons laments. But for those who come after them their wealth abideth, for the ill-starred wretches the cause, aye, the cause whereby their strife came to its end in death.

They parted their possessions in the bitterness of wrath so that each hath equal portion. They that loved them hold not him blameless who wrought their reconciliation; nor is Ares pleasing in their sight.

By strokes of steel are they come to this, and by strokes of steel, there awaiteth them—what? one may ask perchance—a portion in their father's tomb.¹

Our loud-resounding, piercing wail attends them—a wail of unforced sorrow, unforced pain, from minds distressed, wherein there is no thought of joy, and poured forth with tears in all unfeignedness from out a heart that wasteth as I weep for our two princes here.

At the bier of the hapless pair it may be said that they wrought many a deed unto their countrymen and also unto the ranks of all the foreign foe—who perished in numbers in the fight.

Ill-fated, beyond all women that are named with the name of mother, was she who bare them. Her own child she took as her own husband; she brought forth these sons; and they have thus perished by hands that dealt each other death, hands from the self-same seed.

¹ As the brothers were to divide the substance of their dead father, their equal inheritance was the tomb. λαχαί means both "apportioning of possessions" and "digging."

Of the self-same seed, in very sooth, they perished,
and in utter destruction, in unloving severance,
ending their quarrel by frenzied strife.

Their enmity hath ceased. Their life hath been mingled with the blood-soaked earth. In very truth their blood is one. A ruthless resolver of their strife was that stranger from beyond the sea, the whetted steel, sped forth from fire; and ruthless was the cruel apportioner of their wealth, Ares, who made true their father's curse.

They have, the unhappy men, the portion allotted them of the burden of sorrow sent of Heaven. But there shall be unfathomable wealth—of earth—beneath their lifeless clay.

Alas, with many a wreath of woe have ye crowned your house! But at the end of all the Curses raised their shrill song of triumph, now that the race is turned in utter rout. At the gate, whereat they smote each other, now standeth a trophy unto Ruin;
and victorious o'er them both, the Evil Genius stayed his hand.

HERALD

It is my duty to make proclamation of the good pleasure and decree of the Council of our city of Cadmus that hath in charge the interest of its people.

Eteocles, who lieth here, seeing that he hath shown loyalty to his country, it is decreed to bury with kindly interment in its soil; for that, hating the foe, he courted death in the city, and pure of offence towards the shrines of his fathers he hath fallen, free of reproach, where it is an honour for the young to fall. Thus, touching him, it hath been enjoined upon me to proclaim. His brother Poly-nices, however, who lieth there in death, is to be cast forth unburied, a prey to dogs, since he had been the destroyer of the land of Cadmus, were it not that some one of the gods had thwarted him by the spear of his brother who lieth here; and even in death he shall retain the stain of his guilt against his fathers' gods, to whose dishonour he would fain have captured our city by hurling against it an alien host. Wherefore it is decreed that he gain his guerdon—unhonoured burial by winged birds; and that no service of hands attend to pile his barrow nor mourners do him honour with shrill-voiced lament; but that he be refused the grace of funeral rite by loving hands. Such, in respect of him, is the decree of the Cadmean powers.

ANTIGONE

Yea, and I declare unto your Cadmean rulers—if none other be willing to take part with me in burying him, I will bury him, and I will risk the peril of burying mine own brother; nor do I feel shame thus to be an unsubmissive rebel to the State. Strange power—the bond of common blood whence we are sprung, from wretched mother and unhappy sire. Therefore, O my soul, in sisterly loyalty of heart take willing part in his distress with him who has no will, the living with the dead. His flesh no gaunt-bellied wolves shall rend—let no one “decree” me that! Woman that I am, I will contrive for him a burying and a grave, bearing the earth in the folds of my linen raiment. With my own hands I will cover him. Let no man “decree” it otherwise. Courage! I shall find the means to act.

HERALD

I charge thee not thus to bid defiance to the State.

ANTIGONE

I charge thee, make no idle proclamations unto me.

HERALD

And yet ruthless is a people that hath emerged from peril.

ANTIGONE

Let it be ruthless! Unburied he shall not be.

HERALD

What! Wilt thou honour with burial him whom the State detests?

ANTIGONE

Long since the question of his honour has been settled by the gods.

CHORUS

Alas, alas! O Vengeful Spirits, Ministers of Death, who make high vaunt over the ruin of a race, who have thus destroyed, both root and branch, the stock of Oedipus! What course must I pursue?
What action take? What plan must I devise?
How can I have the heart neither to bewail thee nor to escort thee to thy tomb? But I am adread, and shrink in terror of the townsfolk. Thou indeed shalt find many to lament thee; while he, shall he, unhappy one, depart unmourned, his only dirge a sister's tears? Who could consent to that?

THE SEVEN AGAINST THEBES

FIRST HALF-CHORUS

Let the State doom or doom not those that sorrow for Polynices. We, at all events, will go and in funeral train join her in burying him. For all our race hath portion in this sorrow; and what a State approves as just changes with changing times.

SECOND HALF-CHORUS

And we will go with this other corpse even as the State, and justice, too, approves. For after the blessed gods and mighty Zeus, he it was who saved the Cadmean realm from sinking, overturned, beneath an alien surge of men, he most of all.
